Avery ★

R 973
Av

CONCORDIA LIBRARY
BRONXVILLE, N. Y.

United States

Avery ★

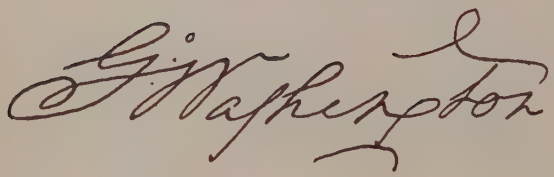

United States

A History of the United States

VOLUME VI

EXITUS ACTA PROBAT

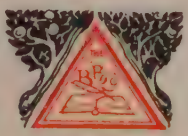

A HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES AND ITS PEOPLE

FROM THEIR EARLIEST RECORDS TO THE PRESENT TIME

BY

ELROY McKENDREE AVERY

IN SIXTEEN VOLUMES
VOLUME VI

CLEVELAND
THE BURROWS BROTHERS
COMPANY MCMIX

E 178
.A95
vol. 6

COPYRIGHT 1909 BY
ELROY MCKENDREE AVERY

MAPS, ILLUSTRATIONS, COMPOSITION, PLATES, AND PRESSWORK BY THE MATTHEWS-NORTHRUP WORKS,
BUFFALO, NEW YORK, CLEVELAND

PREFACE

THE fifth volume of this work told the story of events that culminated in the declaration of American independence — or how our ancestors got into the Revolutionary war. This volume is an attempt to describe, as clearly as space limitations will permit, the events that were crowded into the period between that immortal declaration and the adoption of our national constitution — or how our patriot sires got out of their eight years' war.

In the preceding volumes, I followed official usage in writing the name of the South Carolina metropolis, Charles Town. By an act of incorporation passed on the thirteenth of August, 1783, the name was changed to Charleston, the form used in the present volume.

My obligation to Dr. Paul L. Haworth, as acknowledged in the prefaces to my fourth and fifth volumes, has been enlarged by his continued assistance. I am also under great obligation to Mr. Albion M. Dyer of the Western Reserve Historical Society for the suggestion of a special study of the history of the Seven Ranges and for able and energetic assistance in the prosecution thereof, and to officials and employees of the general land office at Washington City for many courtesies. To the reviewers and many others who have aided me with criticism and suggestion, and especially to my publishers who, in the matter of illustration, seem determined to push each volume into successful rivalry with its predecessor, I desire to express my grateful appreciation.

ELROY M. AVERY

Cleveland, July, 1909

CONCORDIA LIBRAR

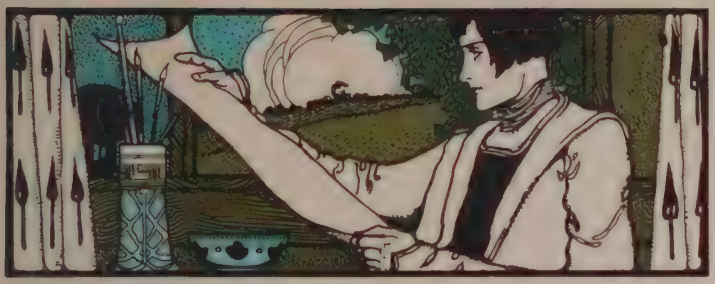

CONTENTS

Introductory: Preface; List of Maps and Illustrations.

I. The New York Campaign 1
II. Trenton and Princeton—Congress . . . 37
III. Brandywine and Germantown 61
IV. Saratoga 88
V. Foreign Relations and the French Alliance 134
VI. New Governments, State and Confederate 150
VII. Valley Forge, Monmouth, and Newport . 164
VIII. Border Warfare and the Conquest of the Northwest 184
IX. The Second Attempt upon the South . 209
X. The War in the North, 1779–80 . . 233
XI. On the Sea 256
XII. European Complications—The Armed Neutrality 274
XIII. The Reclamation of the Carolinas . . 282
XIV. The Final Blow 298
XV. The Sinews of War 326
XVI. The Tories in War Time 333
XVII. Peace 342
XVIII. Disabled and Drifting 374
XIX. Opening the West; the Ordinance of 1787 398
XX. Building the Ship 414
Appendix 439
Bibliographical Appendix 445

NOTE.— A general index will be found in the last volume of this work.

ILLUSTRATIONS

George Washington . . . . Frontispiece

Portrait:

A reproduction of the painting by Gilbert Stuart, called the Gibbs-Channing-Avery portrait. This most interesting likeness of Washington is the representative of Washington's first sitting to Stuart in September, 1795. This sitting originated the first type of the Washington portrait by Stuart, showing the right side of his face. All other portraits of this type are very inferior to the Gibbs Washington in individuality of handling and in detail.

In The Life and Works of Gilbert Stuart (New York, 1879) Mason says: "The finest [portrait of Washington] beyond all comparison is that formerly owned by Dr. William F. Channing of Providence, R. I. It was painted for Colonel Gibbs and from him passed to his sister, Mrs. Channing." A venerable engraver of a generation ago, A. B. Durand, said of it: "That is a likeness. It is much superior in character to the Athenæum portrait and should be considered a standard."

It is at present deposited in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York, as a loan from the late Samuel P. Avery, who purchased it from Mr. Channing.

Autograph:

From an original letter dated February 23, 1794, in the New York Public Library.

Coat of Arms:

Drawn by Mr. Henry Strippel.

Uniform of a Hessian Grenadier of Rall's Regiment 2

Painted, after careful study, by Mr. H. A. Ogden, who prepared the drawings for Uniform of the Army of the United States, 1774 to 1889, published by the Quartermaster-general.

Portrait of Sir Guy Carleton, Governor-general of Canada 5

From a contemporary engraving.

Map Illustrating the Action of Valcour Island on Lake Champlain 6

Plan of the Battle of Valcour Island 7

From original in the Library of Congress (Faden Collection).

View of the Battle of Valcour Island . . . 8
From contemporary engraving in the New York Public Library (Lenox Building).

Coat of Arms of Sir William Howe . . . 9
Depicted in proper colors by Mr. Henry Strippel from Burke's Peerage and Baronetage.

Portrait of Sir William Howe 9
From original mezzotint in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Portrait of Richard Earl Howe . between 10 and 11
From a mezzotint in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection), published, London, 1794; made from a painting by Copley.

General Map to Illustrate the New York Campaign of 1776 11
Prepared from data compiled by Mr. Charles William Burrows.

Currency Issued by New York in 1776 . . 12
Five-dollar bill, obverse and reverse. From collection of the New York Public Library (Lenox Building).

Washington's Proclamation to the People of New York 12
Dated August 17, 1776, warning non-combatants to depart. From original broadside in collection of the New York Historical Society.

Continental Line Infantry, Showing State Distinctions 13
From original drawing by Mr. H. A. Ogden.

Flag of the First Pennsylvania Rifle Regiment . 14
Reproduced from original in the State House, Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, by Mr. J. Horace McFarland, using the Lumiere process of color photography. (This is perhaps the first instance of the commercial use of this process in America.)

Private of Artillery, Continental Line . . . 15
From original drawing by Mr. H. A. Ogden.

Coat of Arms of Israel Putnam 15
Drawn by Mr. Henry Strippel from copy in collection of the New York Public Library (Lenox Building).

Autograph of James Grant 16
From an original letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Map of Battle of Long Island 16
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y., assisted by the Hon. Asa Bird Gardiner, LL. D., L. H. D., M. H.

Lord Stirling (Portrait and Autograph) . . . 17
Portrait from original painting owned by Dr. Robert Watts.

Portrait of Major-general John Sullivan . .
between 18 and 19
From a mezzotint in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Cartridge-box used in the American Revolution . 20
From original in the Essex Institute, Salem, Mass.

Broadside to Encourage Enlistment in the Continental Army . . . between 20 and 21
From a copy in the Boston Public Library.

General Sullivan's Waistcoat 22
From original in collection at the Old South Meeting House, Boston.

Map of the Battle of Harlem Heights 23
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Samuel Selden's Powder-horn 23
Inscribed, "Lyme, March: the, A D: 1776 Major. Samuel Seldens: P: Horn: Made for the Defence of Liberty." Also decorated with carved scenes. Now in collection of the Massachusetts Historical Society.

The Morris Mansion 24
From a photograph.

Portrait of Thomas Knowlton 25
From Trumbull's historic painting of the battle of Bunker Hill, in collection of Yale University.

Liberty Pole Tablet 26
From the original, New York City.

Jonathan Trumbull (Portrait and Autograph) . 26
Portrait from miniature in the Trumbull Gallery at Yale University; autograph from a letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Nathan Hale's Camp Basket 27
From collection of the Connecticut Historical Society.

Maps Showing Route of Nathan Hale into the British Lines and Section of New York City where he was Executed 28
Compiled from information supplied by the late Reverend Doctor Edward Everett Hale.

Page from Diary of a British Officer, Recording Hale's Execution 29
From original in the New York Historical Society.

Two Autographs of Nathan Hale: Ornate, or Schoolmaster's, and Ordinary 29
From original documents in collections of the late Reverend Doctor Edward Everett Hale and Major Godfrey A. S. Wieners.

Hale Family Tombstone at South Coventry, Connecticut 30

Washington's Headquarters at White Plains . . 30
From a photograph.

Colonel John Glover (Portrait and Autograph) . 31 Portrait from painting in possession of Mrs. Henry E. Waite; autograph from a letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

"Glover's Rock" and Memorial Tablet . . 32
From photograph of the original at Pelham Bay Park supplied by Mr. Harris Bradbury Burrows.

Map of the Battle of White Plains . . . 33
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y., and Mr. William Abbatt.

The Falkeneer (Falconeer) House at White Plains, Headquarters of British Officers (no longer standing) 33

Map of the Action of Fort Washington . . 34
Compiled from original sources.

Topographical Map of the North Part of New York Island, Showing plan of Fort Washington between 34 and 35
From The North American Atlas, printed for William Faden, 1777, in collection of the New York Historical Society.

Autograph of Robert Magaw 35
From an original letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

The Margaret Corbin Tablet 35
From a photograph.

Map of Washington's Retreat across New Jersey . 38
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

The Landing of the British Forces in the Jerseys, November 20, 1776 . . between 38 and 39
From original drawing, formerly owned by Francis Rawdon Hastings, in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Broadside of the Philadelphia Council of Safety, asking Colonels and Commanding Officers of the State to be in readiness to meet the Enemy 39
From collection of the New York Historical Society.

Handbill Recounting Outrages Committed by British and Hessian Troops 40
From original in collection of the Pennsylvania Historical Society.

Autograph of Thomas Paine 41
From a letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

First Page of Thomas Paine's Crisis . . . 41
From collection of the Pennsylvania Historical Society.

Portrait of Philip Schuyler 42
From painting by Trumbull at Yale University.

Portrait of Thaddeus Kosciuszko 42
From an engraving by C. Josi about 1793, made from a painting by Josef Grassi. In the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

American Coin, 1776 (scarce) 44
Reverse of the earliest coinage struck by authority of the United States; known as "Fugio"; cast in silver, also in tin and in brass. Values varied. Obverse showed thirteen interlacing rings, each bearing name of a state. A common variant of this piece shows the interesting spelling "Curency" instead of "Currency." From collection of the National Museum, Washington, D. C.

Map of Washington's Advance on Trenton . . 46
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.
Autograph of Rall 47
From letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).
Map of the Battle of Trenton 47
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.
Lieutenant Fischer's Map of the Battle of Trenton 48
From a photograph supplied by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.
Cap Worn by a Hessian Soldier Killed at Trenton 49
From collection of the Essex Institute, Salem, Mass.
Portrait of General John Cadwalader . . . 51
From a miniature by Peale, by kind permission of the owner, Mr. George McCall of Philadelphia.
Map of Washington's Advance and the Battles of Trenton and Princeton 52
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.
Plan of Operations of General Washington against the King's Troops in New Jersey, from December, 1776, to January, 1777 . between 52 and 53
From copy published by William Faden, London, 1777, in collection of the New York Historical Society.
Autograph of Hugh Mercer 53
From letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).
Hugh Mercer's Sword 53
From photograph supplied by Mr. Charles S. Bradford.
Uniforms of Officer and Private, Seventeenth British Foot 54
Supplied by Mr. Samuel M. Milne, Calverley House, Leeds, England.
Nassau Hall 54
From The Continental Congress at Princeton by Varnum Lansing Collins.
Rum Keg 55
Formerly belonged to James Dickerson and Thomas Peabody. Reproduction directly from original kindly loaned by Mr. John E. L. Hazen, Shirley, Mass.
Daniel Hitchcock's Watch 56
In possession of the author.
"The Flight of the Congress"—a Cartoon . . between 58 and 59
Published November 20, 1777 (London); reproduced from copy in the Boston Public Library.
Autograph of Vergennes 59

Commemorative Tablet on the Site of the Provost Prison 62
From a photograph.

Map of the Prison Ship Stations in Wallabout Bay 62
From Stiles's History of Brooklyn.

British Prison Ship "Jersey" 63
From Stiles's History of Brooklyn.

Prison Ship Martyrs' Monument 64
From a photograph supplied by General Horatio C. King.

Map Showing Location of British and American Prisons of War during the Revolution . . 65
Compiled by David Maydole Matteson, A. M., Cambridge, Mass.

Autograph of Return J. Meigs 66
From letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Map of Tryon's Raid of 1777 66
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

The First Flag of the Union 67
Reconstruction showing it as flown at Washington's camp near Boston, January, 1776.

Colonel Alexander Hamilton (Portrait and Autograph) 70
Portrait from original in the Essex Institute, Salem, Mass.

Baron de Kalb (Portrait and Autograph) . . 71
Portrait from a painting in oil owned by the Maryland Historical Society, Baltimore; autograph from an original letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Banner of the Pulaski Legion 72
Reproduced in colors of the original in the collection of the Maryland Historical Society, Baltimore.

Count Casimir Pulaski (Portrait and Autograph) . 73
Portrait from engraving in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris; autograph from original letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Marie Jean Paul Roche Yves Gilbert Motier, Marquis de Lafayette (Portrait and Autograph) . 74
From original at Versailles. Kindly supplied by Mr. Henry Vignaud, Secretary to the American Embassy, Paris. Autograph from letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Uniform of Private of Colonel Moylan's Fourth Regiment of Light Dragoons (American) . 75
From original drawing by Mr. H. A. Ogden.

Autograph of Knyphausen 76
From original letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Map of Campaigns about Philadelphia . . 76, 77
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Uniform of First Troop, Philadelphia Light Horse 77
From original drawing by Mr. H. A. Ogden.

Map of the Battle of the Brandywine 78
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Standard of the Philadelphia Light Horse Troop of 1775 79
Now in possession of the First Troop, Philadelphia City Cavalry. The reproduction, made through courtesy of Captain J. C. Groome, shows its present appearance with great fidelity.

Portrait of Anthony Wayne 80
From collection of the New York Historical Society.

Attack on the Chew House at the Battle of Germantown 83
From historical painting by Edward Lamson Henry now owned by Mrs. Samuel Chew. Reproduced by kind permission.

Map of the Battle of Germantown 84
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Private, Seventeenth Light Dragoons (British), 1763–86 85
From original drawing by Mr. H. A. Ogden.

Map of Operations on the Delaware 86
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

General Theater of Burgoyne's Campaign of 1777 . 90
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Autograph of General William Phillips 91
From original letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Canteen of the Revolutionary Period 91
From collection of the Rhode Island Historical Society.

Caricature on Employment of Indians by the British 92
Published in London, 1780. From an original.

Map of the Investment of Fort Ticonderoga . . 93
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Soldiers' Belt Buckles (Brass, Silver, and Copper) found at Ticonderoga 94
Reproduced directly from originals kindly loaned by Mr. Silas H. Paine.

Map of the Battle of Hubbardton 94
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Cartridge-box used during the Revolution . . 95
From collection of Mr. H. A. Ogden.

Two Flags of the Second New Hampshire Regiment taken by the Ninth British Foot at Fort Anne 95
Now in the possession of Colonel George W. Rogers, Wykeham, Burgess Hill, Sussex, England, through whose kind assistance we obtained colored photographs from which the above are engraved. These are the only flags now in existence captured from American Regiments during the war of the Revolution, according to Mr. Gherardi Davis in his Regimental Colors in the War of the Revolution.

Autograph of General Arthur Saint Clair . . 96
From original letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Soldier's Pocket-knife found near Fort Ticonderoga 96
Reduced reproduction directly from original kindly loaned by Mr. Silas H. Paine.

One of the Axes used by Burgoyne's Troops, found at Schuylerville, New York 97
Reduced reproduction directly from original kindly loaned by Mr. Silas H. Paine.

Uniform of a Brunswick Dragoon (dismounted) of Lieutenant-colonel Baum's Regiment . . 98
Drawn by Mr. H. A. Ogden.

General Simon Fraser's Letter to Baron Riedesel between 98 and 99
From original in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Portrait of General John Stark 99
From oil painting now in office of the mayor of Manchester, N. H.

Map of the Mohawk-Oneida Route and Settlements 100, 101
From Mante's History of the Late War, London, 1772.

Map of the Battle of Bennington 100
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Portrait of Joseph Brant 101
From mezzotint in the British Museum.

Autograph of John Butler 102
From original letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Diagram Representing the Order of March of Saint Leger's Troops 102
Reduced facsimile of original found in the writing-desk of Saint Leger, left behind when he fled from his camp before Fort Schuyler. Contained in the Gansevoort Papers in possession of Mrs. Catherine Gansevoort Lansing.

Muster-roll of Colonel Peter Gansevoort's Staff and Other Officers . . . between 102 and 103
From the Gansevoort Papers in possession of Mrs. Catherine Gansevoort Lansing.

Portrait of Colonel Peter Gansevoort . . . 103
From original by Stuart in possession of Mrs. Catherine Gansevoort Lansing.

Abraham Swartwout's Letter to Colonel Gansevoort requesting an Order for Cloth to Replace his Blue Coat used for "Colours" . . . 104
From original in possession of Mrs. Catherine Gansevoort Lansing. Contained in the Gansevoort Papers.

Diagram of Fort Stanwix (Fort Schuyler) . . 105
Facsimile of contemporary drawing in possession of Mrs. Catherine Gansevoort Lansing. Contained in the Gansevoort Papers.

Autograph of Nicholas Herkimer 106
From original letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Herkimer Monument at Oriskany . . . 106
From a photograph.

Map of the Siege of Fort Schuyler . . . 107
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Monument to Marinus Willett at Albany . . 107
From a photograph.

Old Church at German Flats, Built in 1767 near Fort Herkimer 108
From a photograph.

Gansevoort's Statue at Rome, New York . . 108
From a photograph.

Soldier's Pewter Spoon found near Fort Edward . 109
Direct reproduction from original, kindly loaned by Mr. Silas H. Paine.

Portrait of General Horatio Gates 110
From collection of Mr. Charles Henry Hart.

Map of the Battle of Freeman's Farm . . . 113
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Portrait of Simon Fraser 114
From painting by Scouter, engraved by James Watson, from the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Plan of Attack on Forts Clinton and Montgomery, October, 1777 . . . between 116 and 117
Published by William Faden, London, 1784; reproduced from copy in colors in collection of the New York Historical Society.

Map of the Attack on Forts Montgomery and Clinton 117
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Proclamation by the New York Council of Safety . 118
Dated July 30, 1777. From the Emmet Collection in the New York Public Library.

Silver Bullet and Clinton's Message . . . 119
Found on spy captured by the Americans From an engraving of the original kindly supplied by Mr. B. M. Brink.

Enlistment Paper signed by Enoch Poor when he Joined the Army as a Private . . . 120
From original document in collection of the Essex Institute.

Portraits of Major Acland and Lady Harriet Acland 121
From engravings of the paintings by Reynolds, now in possession of Sir Charles Thomas Dyke Acland.

Map of the Battle of Bemis Heights . . . 122
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Portrait of Alexander Lindsay, Sixth Earl of Balcarres 123
Reproduced from original painting owned by the Earl of Crawford and Balcarres, kindly supplied in colors by Lord Balcarres.

"Plan of the Position which the Army under L^t. Gen^l. Burgoine took at Saratoga" . . . between 124 and 125
From copy in collection of the New York Historical Society.

General Simon Fraser's Funeral 125
From engraving showing view of the west bank of the Hudson River. From Travels through the Interior Parts of America, by an Officer (Anburey).

Map of Burgoyne's Surrender at Saratoga . . 126
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Articles of "Convention" between Lieutenant-general Burgoyne and Major-general Gates . . between 126 and 127 Signed at Saratoga, October 16, 1777. From original document in possession of the New York Historical Society.

Coat of Arms of Burgoyne 127
From Burke's Peerage and Baronetage. Drawn in colors by Mr. Henry Strippel.

British Cartoon on the Surrender of Burgoyne . 128
From the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

General Gates's Letter to Hancock Announcing Burgoyne's Surrender . . between 128 and 129
Dated October 18, 1777. From original in the Library of Congress, Division of Manuscripts.

Surrender of Burgoyne 129
Facsimile (reduced) reproduction of Trumbull's famous painting in the rotunda of the Capitol at Washington.

Bronze Medal Awarded by Congress to Horatio Gates 131
From copy in collection of the New York Historical Society.

Boot worn by Dragoon of Riedesel's Forces . . 132
Taken prisoner at Saratoga, he traveled to Easton, Pennsylvania, on foot with other prisoners and wore this boot and its mate as far as Middlehope (North Newburgh). There he exchanged them for lighter ones. At Washington's Headquarters Museum, Newburgh, N. Y.

Saratoga Battle Monument 132
From a photograph.

Pistol from the Saratoga Battlefield between 132 and 133
Kindly loaned by present owner, Mr. Samuel Ludlow Frey, Palatine Bridge, New York.

Dinner-plate . . . . between 132 and 133
One of blue canton set used at the entertainment of Burgoyne after his surrender at the old Sylvester home at Kinderhook, New York. Kindly loaned by present owner, Mr. Samuel Ludlow Frey, Palatine Bridge, New York.

Portrait of Louis XVI. 134
From painting by Duplessis at Versailles.

Portrait of Silas Deane 135
From engraving in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Portrait and Autograph of Arthur Lee . . . 137
Portrait from original in collection of the Virginia Historical Society; autograph from original letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Autograph of Doctor Benjamin Rush . . . 137
From original letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Coat of Arms of Richard Henry Lee . . . 138
From The Lee Family of Virginia, in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

French Map of the United States . between 142 and 143
Published, Paris, France, 1778. Said to be the first map published in France in which this country is called "Etats Unis" (United States). From copy in the Library of Congress, Map Division.

Autographs of the Royal Peace Commissioners . 144
From original documents in the Library of Congress.

Pass Given to Adam Ferguson by the Royal Peace Commissioners 145
From original document in the Library of Congress.

Last Page of Letter to Congress by Carlisle, Clinton, Eden, and Johnstone, Dated July 11, 1778 146
From original in the Library of Congress, Division of Manuscripts.

Lafayette's Challenge to Lord Carlisle . . .
between 146 and 147
Sent because of an alleged insult to France contained in a public letter written by this nobleman. From a facsimile of the original in the Library of Congress, Division of Manuscripts.

Congress's Manifesto in Response to the Overtures of the Peace Commissioners, Dated October 30, 1778 148
From original in the Library of Congress.

Caricature of the Peace Commission of 1778 . . 149
From copy in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Rhode Island Ballot for Colony Officers . . 150
From a copy in the Rhode Island Historical Society.

South Carolina State Seal adopted in 1776 (obverse and reverse) 151
Photographed from plaster cast of seal, kindly supplied by Mr. A. S. Salley Jr., Secretary of The Historical Commission of South Carolina.

Red Hill, the Homestead of Patrick Henry . . 151
From a photograph kindly supplied by Mrs. Elizabeth Henry Lyons, a great-granddaughter.

Proclamation by Jonathan Trumbull, Governor of Connecticut, relative to the Western Claims of that Colony 161
From original copy in the Connecticut State Library.

Title-page of Pelatiah Webster's Pamphlet on the Constitution 162
From copy in the New York Public Library.

Plan of Encampment at Valley Forge 164
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Washington's Proclamation, issued at Valley Forge, December 20, 1777 165
From collection of the Pennsylvania Historical Society.

Autograph of William Barton 166
From the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Book of "General Orders" Kept at the Camp at Valley Forge . . . . between 166 and 167
This particular page is dated January 1, 1778, and besides showing details for guards, etc., is especially interesting because it orders the distribution of a gill of spirits to each non-commissioned officer and soldier in the command. From original order-book on file in the Adjutant-general's office, War Department, Washington, D. C.

House in which Prescott was Captured . . . 167
From Field's History of Rhode Island.

American Uniforms, as depicted in Historisch-Genealogischer Calender oder Jahrbuch, Leipzic, 1784 167
Facsimile copy by Mr. H. A. Ogden. The plates in the "Calender" are from designs of Dan'l N. Chodowiecki, who died in 1801, aged 75, Director of the Academy of Arts and Sciences in Berlin.

Camp Bed used by George Washington at Valley Forge (folded and open) 168
Photographed from the original in the collection of the New York Historical Society.

Portrait of Martha Washington 169
From Stuart's painting in the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston, Mass.

Autograph of Thomas Conway 169
From the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Autograph of General Cadwalader 170
From the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Portrait of Baron Steuben, by Ralph Earle . . 170
From original painting owned by Mrs. F. B. Austin of New York. Reproduced in colors of original by courteous permission.

Uniforms of Riflemen and Pennsylvania Infantry, as depicted in Historisch-Genealogischer Calender oder Jahrbuch, Leipzic, 1784 171
Facsimile copy by Mr. H. A. Ogden.

Bayonet of Revolutionary Time 172
From Burgoyne's camp in the town of Kingsbury, Washington Co., N. Y. From collection of Mr. Silas H. Paine.
British Defenses at Philadelphia 173
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.
"A Picturesque View of the State of Great Britain for 1778" 174
A caricature. From copy in the Boston Public Library.
Portrait of Major André 175
From a drawing by Sir Joshua Reynolds in possession of Thomas Addis Emmet, M. D., New York City.
Portrait of Peggy Shippen when a Girl . . . 175
From a painting owned by Mr. Parker C. Chandler of New York City.
Lafayette at Barren Hill 176
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.
Map of Battle of Monmouth 178
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.
Table on which Moll Pitcher told Fortunes during the American Revolution 179
Now in the Essex Institute, Salem, Mass.
Moll Pitcher Tablet 179
From Monmouth battle monument.
Portrait of Count d'Estaing by Le Brun . . . 180
From original painting in the Museum at Versailles.
Autograph of Gerard 180
From the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).
View of Newport in 1730 180
From a print in the private collection of Doctor Thomas Addis Emmet.
"A Plan of the Harbour of New York" . . .
between 180 and 181
Comprises the whole of New York and Staten Island, part of Long Island and the Jersey shore, and shows the defenses of New York both by land and sea. Published by J. Bew, London, 1781; reproduced from copy in the New York Public Library (Lenox Building).
Autograph of Robert Pigot 181
From the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).
Map of Siege of Newport 182
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.
Letter of Recommendation of Lafayette from the Congress of the United States to the King of France . . . . . between 182 and 183
From original document at the New York Historical Society.
Autograph of Griffith Rutherford 184
From the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).
Map of Wyoming and Cherry Valleys . . . 185
Compiled by Mr. Vincent A. Benda.

View of Forty Fort 186
From official souvenir of Wilkesbarre Centennial supplied by the Reverend Horace E. Hayden.

Wyoming Massacre Monument 186
From a photograph.

Map of Indian Operations in the East . . . 187
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y. Revised by David Maydole Matteson, A. M.

Brant's Letter, April 10, 1780, translated by the Reverend Samuel Kirkland 188
From original document loaned by Mr. Samuel Ludlow Frey.

Portrait of General John Sullivan 189
From Tenney's painting in the State House, Concord, N. H.

Public Instructions given to Lieutenant-colonel George Rogers Clark by Patrick Henry, January 2, 1778 . . . between 190 and 191
From original document in the Library of the Wisconsin Historical Society, Madison, Wisconsin.

First Page of Private Instructions given to Lieutenant-colonel George Rogers Clark by Patrick Henry . . . . . between 190 and 191
From original document in collection of the Virginia Historical Society.

Map of Indian Operations in the West. . . . 192
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y. Revised by David Maydole Matteson, A. M.

Autograph of the Missionary, Pierre Gibault . . 193

Map of George Rogers Clark's Expeditions . . 196
Compiled by Mr. Vincent A. Benda.

Articles of Capitulation of Fort Vincennes . . between 198 and 199
From facsimile in possession of Colonel Clarence Monroe Burton, of Detroit, Michigan.

Letter from George Rogers Clark to Lieutenant-governor Henry Hamilton, Demanding Unconditional Surrender of Vincennes . . . 199
From original in Draper MSS. collection, in the Wisconsin Historical Society.

George Rogers Clark (Portrait and Autograph) . 202
Portrait from the Virginia State Library, Richmond, Va. Autograph from the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Relics of George Rogers Clark—Rifle, Tomahawk, Watch, Pocket Compass, Knife, Powder-horn, Pistol, and Sword 203
In possession of Colonel R. T. Durrett, Louisville, Kentucky.

Portrait of François Vigo 204
Photographed from original oil painting in Vincennes University, founded in 1806. Kindly supplied by Mr. Edward S. Clark.

Autograph of William Crawford 206
From the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Siege of Fort Henry, September 11, 1782, the Last Battle of the Revolution 207
From historical painting by Joseph A. Faris, in possession of the city of Wheeling. While imaginative, it is from a careful study of conditions attending the incident, and is of historical value.

Autograph of Augustine Prevost 209
From the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

General Map of the Southern Campaign to the close of 1780, Invasion of the Carolinas . . 210
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Letter to Major-general Benjamin Lincoln from General John Ashe Regarding Movements of the Troops in Georgia . . between 210 and 211
Dated February 21, 1779. From original in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Campbell's Letter to Lincoln Relative to Exchange of Prisoners, dated January 9, 1779 . . 211
Photographed from original in collection of the New York Public Library.

Detail Map of the Southern Campaign to the close of 1780, Invasion of the Carolinas . . . 212
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Proclamation by Prevost, Parker, and Campbell to the People of Georgia, March 4, 1779 . . between 212 and 213
Broadside from copy in the Library of Congress.

Portrait of Benjamin Lincoln. 213
Photographed from portrait by Sargent, in possession of the Massachusetts Historical Society.

Pulaski's Letter to the Auditor of the Army, March 27, 1779 214
From collection of the New York Public Library (Lenox Building).

Map of the Siege of Savannah 215
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Lord Rawdon, Francis Rawdon Hastings (Portrait and Autograph) 216
From mezzotint of the original painting by Sir Joshua Reynolds, in the possession of the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection); autograph from the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Map of the Siege of Charleston 217
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Coat of Arms of Arthur Middleton . . . 218
Drawn in proper heraldic colors by Mr. Henry Strippel, from copy in Vermont's America Heraldica.

Portrait of Arthur Middleton and Family . . 218
Reproduced in colors from original painting by Benjamin West, by courteous permission of present owner, Mr. Henry Middleton Fisher.

Banastre Tarleton (Portrait and Autograph) . . 219
Portrait from a mezzotint by Reynolds in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection); autograph from the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Proclamation, One of Many, Issued by Clinton and Arbuthnot 220
From printed copy in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Francis Marion (Portrait and Autograph) . . 222
Portrait from a painting by H. N. Hyneman of New York. This portrait was not painted from life but the artist used all the available material in shape of descriptions, engravings drawn from memory and the like, and is the most satisfactory reproduction of General Marion to be procured.

A Caricature of Charles Lee 224
Photographed from illustration in Girdlestone's Facts tending to prove that General Lee was the author of Junius' Letters, London, 1813. From the New York Public Library.

Map of the Battle of Camden 226
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Map of the Battle of King's Mountain . . . 230
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Portion of the Last Page of Letter from Baron Steuben to Governor Jonathan Trumbull . 234
Dated September 19, 1779. This document is in the collection of the Connecticut Historical Society.

British Cartoon, "The Political Raree-show" . between 234 and 235
Published in the Westminster Magazine, June, 1779. Shows the Saratoga surrender among the twelve incidents caricatured. From copy in collection of the New York Historical Society.

Map of Tryon's Raid into Connecticut in 1779 . 235
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Map of the Capture of Stony Point . . . 236
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Medal Awarded to Anthony Wayne for the Capture of Stony Point 236
From a copy.

George Washington's Autograph Letter to Doctor Cochran . . . . between 236 and 237 Dated at West Point, August 16, 1779. Interesting letter regarding dinner invitation with apologies to the guests as to the nature of the fare they may expect, stating that his cook "has had the surprising luck to discover that apples will make pyes." Further states that they must "submit to partake of it on plates—once tin but now iron—not become so by the labor of scouring." From collection of the New York Historical Society.

Map of the Penobscot Expedition 237
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Camp Kettle of General Anthony Wayne, Inherited from Susan Hubberd, Grandmother of his Wife 238
From collection of the Pennsylvania Historical Society.

View of Paulus Hook 238
Facsimile of a water color painted by a British officer during the Revolution. From a print in the private collection of Doctor Thomas Addis Emmet.

Autograph of the Reverend James Caldwell . . 239
From the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Flag of the Second Rhode Island Regiment . . 239
From original at State House, Providence, R. I. Information regarding this and other flags was very courteously supplied by Mr. Gherardi Davis, author of Regimental Colors in the War of the Revolution, in which book a beautiful colored reproduction of this flag appears as frontispiece.

Map of the Battle of Springfield, New Jersey . . 240
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Webb's Third Connecticut Regiment Flag used during the Revolutionary War 240
Now owned by the Pennsylvania Society of the Sons of the Revolution, by whose courteous permission it is reproduced in colors in facsimile of its present appearance.

Portrait of the Marquis de Chastellux . . . 241
From a photograph of original painting supplied by M. Em. Terquem, Paris.

Advance of British Army from Staten Island . . 241
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Portrait of Polly Lawton 242
Reproduced in colors from miniature by Peale in 1790, by courteous permission of the present owner, Mr. George P. Lawton.

Portrait of Benedict Arnold 242
From a private plate owned by Doctor Thomas Addis Emmet.

"A View of West Point on Hudsons River," 1780 . . . . . 244, 245
By Major L'Enfant, Engineer. From facsimile in Boynton's History of West Point.

House of Beverly Robinson 246
From a photograph made about 1885. House is no longer standing.

Broadside by Benedict Arnold . between 246 and 247
Addressed to the inhabitants of America, containing vindication of his conduct. This is the only known copy of this publication appearing as a broadside, though the address was published in certain papers.

Villefranche's Plan of West Point 247
From facsimile in Boynton's History of West Point.

Portrait of Major André 248
From the original painting by Copley, in the Corcoran Gallery of Art, Washington. Reproduced by special permission of the owner, Mr. C. F. Gunther.

Major André's Pocket-book 249
In collection of the Connecticut Historical Society.

Arnold's Pass to Major André 249
From original document in the New York State Library, Albany, N. Y.

Medal Awarded by Congress to Williams, Paulding, and Van Wart for the Capture of André . . 250
Reproduced from original in the New York Historical Society.

Paper found in Major André's Possession when he was Captured . . . between 250 and 251
Dated September 13, 1780. Contains an estimate of the forces garrisoning West Point. From original copy in the New York State Library.

Map to Illustrate Arnold's Treason and André's Capture 251
Compiled by Mr. William Abbatt.

Commission of Benjamin Tallmadge between 252 and 253
Signed by John Hancock, December 14, 1776. From original in collection of the Society of the Sons of the Revolution in the State of New York at Fraunces Tavern.

Flag of Tallmadge's Dragoons . between 252 and 253
From original in possession of Mrs. J. H. Knox, Troy, New York, by courteous permission.

Portraits of the Tallmadge Family between 252 and 253
Painted by Ralph Earle, 1790. Reproduced by courteous permission of the present owner, Mrs. Mary F. Seymour.

Portrait of Major André 253
From an engraving in Political Magazine, March, 1781.

André's Own Sketch of Himself 254
Original in the collection of Yale University, New Haven, Conn.

Mrs. Benedict Arnold (Peggy Shippen) and Child . 254 Reduced facsimile of portrait by Sir Thomas Lawrence, in collection of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania.

Arnold's Proclamation after his Treason . . between 254 and 255
To the officers and soldiers of the continental army, urging them to be no longer the tools and dupes of congress. The information regarding this broadside was obtained in a note from Mr. Worthington C. Ford, Chief of Division of Manuscripts, Library of Congress, Washington, D. C., dated May 2, 1908, reading as follows: "Can you not find room for the reproduction of Benedict Arnold's proclamation after his treason? The only copy I have ever seen turned up in some miscellaneous Jefferson papers, and while one of the lower corners is a little torn, yet the contents are of such a nature as to make them of particular personal value."

Washington's Circular Letter to Nathanael Greene between 254 and 255 Detailing the critical condition of the army and urging the abandonment of short time enlistments. From the original in the office of the Rhode Island Secretary of State.

Autograph of Commodore Whipple . . . 259
From the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Birthplace of John Paul Jones 260
From a photograph.

Facsimile of Jones's Commission as Captain . . 261

The "Stars and Stripes" of the "Bon Homme Richard" 261
Reproduced from a photograph colored in close facsimile of the present appearance of the flag. The flag is now deposited in the National Museum at Washington. This is not the flag flown during the action with the "Serapis," as that flag was sent down with the "Bon Homme Richard" when she sank, in honor of her gallant dead.

Broadside Soliciting Enlistment Under John Paul Jones 262
From original at the Essex Institute, Salem, Mass.

Map of the Movements of the "Ranger" . . 263
Compiled by Mrs. Annie H. Eastman, assistant to the Librarian of the Naval War Records Library, Washington, D. C.

John Paul Jones (Portrait and Autograph) . . 264
Portrait by Peale at Independence Hall, Philadelphia. Autograph from the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Autograph of Peter Landais 264
From the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Portrait of Sir Richard Pearson 265
From mezzotint in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Cruises of John Paul Jones in British Waters . between 264 and 265
Compiled by Mrs. Annie H. Eastman, assistant to the Librarian of the Naval War Records Library, Washington, D. C., by careful investigation of original sources and material, including parts of the log of the "Bon Homme Richard."

Position of the Fleets before the Engagement of September 23, 1779 266
Compiled by Mrs. Annie H. Eastman, assistant to the Librarian of the Naval War Records Library, Washington, D. C.

The Engagement, September 23, 1779 . . . 267
Compiled by Mrs. Annie H. Eastman, assistant to the Librarian of the Naval War Records Library, Washington, D. C.

Course of the "Bon Homme Richard," September 10 to September 23, 1779 . . . 268, 269
Compiled by Mrs. Annie H. Eastman, assistant to the Librarian of the Naval War Records Library, Washington, D. C.

"The memorable Engagement of Captn. Pearson of the Serapis, with Paul Jones of the Bon Homme Richard & his Squadron, Sep. 23, 1779" 269
Reproduced from copper-plate engraving by John Boydell, published in 1780.

A Page from the Log of the "Bon Homme Richard" 270
Supplied by Mrs. Annie H. Eastman, assistant to the Librarian of the Naval War Records Library, Washington, D. C.

Brass Candlestick Saved from the Sinking Wreck of the "Bon Homme Richard" after her Engagement with the "Serapis" . . . 271
In collection of the Massachusetts Historical Society.

Sword Presented to John Paul Jones by Louis XVI. 272
From data and illustration supplied by Mr. Charles Henry Hart. Sword now in possession of Colonel Richard Dale.

Medal Awarded to Jones by Congress . . . 272
From a restrike of the original in possession of Mr. Charles William Burrows.

Portrait of Vergennes 274
From painting in the Galerie de Versailles, near Paris.

Portrait of Admiral Rodney 276
From the National Portrait Gallery, London. Original by Sir Joshua Reynolds.

Portrait of Catherine II. of Russia 278
From miniature in Williamson's History of Portrait Miniatures in the New York Public Library. Copy was made from the Czar of Russia's Collection.

Map to Illustrate Attitude of European Nations Toward the American Revolution . . . 279
Prepared by David Maydole Matteson, A. M.

General Nathanael Greene (Portrait and Autograph) 282
Portrait from original painting by Peale by courteous permission of the owner, Mrs. Katherine Porter Greene. Autograph from original letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

General Map to Illustrate the Southern Campaign of 1781 283
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Detail Map to Accompany General Map Illustrating Southern Campaign of 1781 284
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Autograph of Andrew Pickens 285
From the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Portrait of Daniel Morgan 286
From portrait by Peale in Independence Hall, Philadelphia.

Map of the Battle of Cowpens 286
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Flag of the Third Maryland Regiment . . . 287
The only national ensign known to be in existence that was used as a regimental color in the war of the Revolution. Preserved in the flag-room of the capitol at Annapolis.

Bronze Medal Awarded by Congress to Daniel Morgan for his Victory at Cowpens . . 288
From a restrike.

Arms of Nathanael Greene 289
Drawn in correct heraldic colors by Mr. Henry Strippel.

Map of the Battle of Guilford Court House . . 290
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Grenadier of the Twenty-third Foot (British) . . 291
Drawn by Mr. H. A. Ogden

Lantern used in Cornwallis's Army . . . 292
Now in possession of the Essex Institute, Salem, Mass.

Broadside, "Cornwallis Retreating" between 292 and 293
This is an extract from a letter by Major-general Nathanael Greene, dated Camp at Buffalo Creek, March 23, 1781; reproduced from a copy in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Map of the Battle of Hobkirks Hill . . . 293
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Map of the Siege of Ninety Six 294
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Map of the Battle of Eutaw Springs . . . 295
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Flag of Colonel William Washington's Cavalry Troop, commonly Called the Eutaw Standard . 296
In possession of the Washington Light Infantry Corps of Charleston, South Carolina. We are indebted to Captain W. S. Lanneau, of the Washington Light Infantry, for assistance in securing a colored photograph of it.

Map of Arnold's Position at Richmond, January 5, 1781 298
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Map of Operations in Virginia in 1781 . . . 299
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Map of Operations on the Chesapeake Bay, March, 1781 300
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Uniform of Lafayette's Light Infantry . . . 301
Drawn by Mr. H. A. Ogden.

Overshoes worn by Lafayette 301
In collection of the Rhode Island Historical Society.

Map of Phillips's Position at Petersburg . . 302
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.

Coat of Arms of Cornwallis 303
From Burke's Peerage and Baronetage. Drawn in colors by Mr. Henry Strippel.

Count de Rochambeau (Portrait and Autograph) . 305
Portrait from original painting by La Riviere in the museum at Versailles.
Map of Washington's and Rochambeau's March to Yorktown 306
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.
Manuscript Map (in French) of the Position of the American and French Armies at Phillipsburg, 1781 . . . . . between 306 and 307
In colors from original in the New York Historical Society.
Count de Grasse (Portrait and Autograph) . . 308
Portrait from original painting by Maugaitte in the museum at Versailles; autograph from the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).
Diploma from Yale College Conferring Degree of LL. D. on Washington, September 12, 1781 between 308 and 309
From original in the Library of Congress.
Cap Worn by Captain Titcomb of Washington's Life Guard 309
From collection of the Essex Institute.
Map of Operations on the Chesapeake Bay, in September, 1781 310
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.
Map of Arnold's Attack on New London . . 311
Autograph of William Ledyard 311
From a letter dated April 4, 1781.
Manuscript Plan of Fort Griswold between 312 and 313
Drawn about 1781, probably by an American engineer; from original drawing in the Faden collection of maps in the Library of Congress.
Manuscript Map of New London and Groton, with Attacks on Forts Trumbull and Griswold . between 312 and 313
Reproduced from original colored drawing in the Faden collection of maps in the Library of Congress.
Map of the Siege of Yorktown 314
Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.
Plan of the Siege of Yorktown . between 314 and 315
Published March 1, 1787 (London). From copy in colors in collection of the New York Historical Society.
Flag of the Gatinois Regiment (French) . . 315
Flag of the Saintonge Regiment (French) . . 315
Autograph of Thomas Nelson 316
From original in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).
Nelson House at Yorktown 316
From a photograph.

Flag of the Royal Deux-Ponts Regiment (French). 316
Some Uniforms of French Officers and Privates who served in the American Revolution under Rochambeau . . . between 316 and 317
Reproduced from original drawings made by Mr. G. Noyon, Paris.
Moore House at Yorktown 318
From a photograph.
Portrait of Charles, Earl Cornwallis, Lieutenant-general in the British Army 319
Reproduced in reduced facsimile of original, painted by Copley, in Guildhall, London.
Epaulets Worn by Washington at Yorktown . . 319
In collection of the Massachusetts Historical Society.
Medal Issued by Congress to Commemorate the Surrender of the British at Saratoga and Yorktown 320
From a restrike.
Ansbach-Bayreuth Color . . between 320 and 321
This Ansbach-Bayreuth flag is one of three surrendered at Yorktown and preserved to this day. It now hangs in the chapel of the United States Military Academy at West Point.
Surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown . . . 321
Close facsimile of original picture painted by John Trumbull in 1787; now in the Trumbull Gallery, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut.
Colonel Peter Gansevoort's Third New York Regiment Flag, made in 1778 or 1779 and Carried at the Siege of Yorktown . . . 322
Reproduced from a carefully colored photograph by courteous permission of Mrs. Abraham Gansevoort Lansing of Albany, N. Y.
Autograph of Tench Tilghman 322
From original letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).
Yorktown Monument 323
From a photograph.
Autograph of John Laurens 324
From original letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).
Greene's Monument at Savannah 325
From a photograph.
Georgia Currency of 1776 326
From specimen in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).
New Hampshire Currency of 1775 . . . 326
From specimen in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).
Thirty-dollar Bill of 1775 327
From specimen in collection of the New York Historical Society.
Genuine and Counterfeit Continental Bill . . 327
From Harper's Magazine.
Continental Currency of 1778 (obverse and reverse) 328
From specimen in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Portrait of Thomas Jones of New York, a Prominent Loyalist 334
Button of Butler's Rangers 339
From collection of Mr. W. L. Calver.
Button of the King's American Regiment . . 339
From collection of Mr. W. L. Calver.
Belt Plate of Butler's Rangers, Found at Fort George, Canada, Opposite Fort Niagara, New York . 339
From collection of Mr. W. L. Calver.
Autograph of Henry Laurens 342
From original letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).
The American Peace Commission of 1782 . . 343
Facsimile of West's unfinished painting owned by Lord Belper of Kingston Hall, Kegworth, Derby, England, reproduced by his special permission.
Autograph of Rockingham 344
From original letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).
Autograph of Shelburne 345
From original letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).
Map of the Boundary Negotiations of 1782, Interpreted According to a Contemporary Map . 350 Simplified from a reduction of Mitchell's map of 1755. Compiled by David Maydole Matteson, A. M.
Map of Boundaries proposed in the Negotiations of 1782, between the United States and England, according to a modern map . . . 351
Compiled by David Maydole Matteson, A. M.
Broadside Announcing the Signing of the Preliminary Treaty 358
From a copy in the senate chamber of the old Senate House, Kingston, New York, kindly supplied by Mr. Julius Schoonmaker.
Proclamation Announcing Signing of Definitive Treaty of Peace . . . between 360 and 361
From original in collection of the Massachusetts Historical Society.
Signatures to the Treaty of 1783 361
From the original document in the Department of State, Washington.
North America after the Peace of 1783 . . . 362
Compiled by David Maydole Matteson, A. M.
Proclamation by Elias Boudinot . between 362 and 363
Declaring cessation of hostilities, April 11, 1783. Broadside published in Rhode Island, April 22, 1783; reproduced from copy in collection of the Rhode Island Historical Society.
Washington's Headquarters at Newburg . . 363
From a recent photograph.
Portrait of General Henry Knox 363
Reproduced in colors from Stuart's painting deposited by the City of Boston in the Museum of Fine Arts.

Order of the Society of the Cincinnati . . . 364
Worn by His Excellency President-general George Washington at the first meeting of the General Society, Philadelphia, May, 1784. Direct reproduction from the original through kindness of the Hon. Asa Bird Gardiner, LL.D., L. H. D., M. H., President of the Rhode Island State Society of the Cincinnati and Secretary-general.

Title-page of Aedanus Burke's Pamphlet on the Order of the Cincinnati 364
From a copy of the original edition in the Library of Harvard University.

An Early Survey for a Canal at Fort Stanwix . 365
From original in the Gansevoort Papers in possession of Mrs. Catherine Gansevoort Lansing.

Proclamation by Elias Boudinot Disbanding the Continental Army 366
From original in the Library of Congress.

A Negro Soldier's Discharge after the War . . 368
From facsimile in Nell's The Colored Patriots of the American Revolution.

Autograph of Christopher Greene 369

Washington Resigning his Commission . . . 370
Close facsimile of original picture painted by John Trumbull in 1787; now in the Trumbull Gallery, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut.

Flag of the "Bucks of America," a Colored Regiment that served in the Revolution . . 371
From original in collection of the Massachusetts Historical Society.

Whitehall Ferry Tablet 371
From a photograph.

Last Page of Washington's Military Accounts of the American Revolution 372
From original in the Library of Congress.

Title-page of the First Printed Edition of the Newburg Letters 376
From copy in the Library of Congress.

Autograph of Gouverneur Morris 379
From original in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Title-page of the Rutgers vs. Waddington Case . 381
Photographed from a copy of this rare pamphlet in the New York Public Library.

Autograph of James Wilkinson 385
From original letter in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Map of State Claims and Cessions, 1780–1802 . 388
Compiled by David Maydole Matteson, A. M.

Continental Budget for 1786 390
From Reports of the Board of Treasury in the New York Public Library.

Some Coins used during the Revolution . .
between 390 and 391
From collection of the United States National Museum, Washington, D. C.

Ordinance for the Establishment of a Mint . . 392
From original document in collection of the New York Historical Society.

Promissory Note signed by Daniel Shays . . 394
In collection of the New England Historical and Genealogical Society, Boston.

Governor Bowdoin's Proclamation, January 12, 1787 395
From original in the New York Public Library.

Jefferson's Plan for the Organization of the Northwest Territory . . . between 400 and 401 Shows peculiar names suggested for these places — Chersonesus, Assenisipia, Metropotamia, Polypotamia, Pelisipia, and others. From the original in possession of Colonel Clarence Monroe Burton, of Detroit, Michigan.

Map of Proposed States in the West, 1777–86 . 402
Compiled by David Maydole Matteson, A. M.

Autograph of Thomas Hutchins 403
From original in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

An Ordinance for the Government of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the River Ohio . . . . . between 404 and 405
From a printed copy in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Plat of the Seven Ranges of Townships . . between 406 and 407
Surveyed by Captain Thomas Hutchins, Geographer of the United States, in accordance with ordinance and resolutions of congress passed May 20, 1785, and subsequently. From early copper-plate impression of the survey, unpublished in recent times, discovered in 1909 by Albion Morris Dyer, A. M., Curator of the Western Reserve Historical Society, in the archives of the United States Geological Survey, Washington, D. C. This original is in the Museum of the Western Reserve Historical Society, by loan from the United States Geological Survey.

Ohio Company's Land Contract . between 408 and 409
From original in collection of Marietta College, Marietta, Ohio.

Portrait of Arthur Saint Clair 410
From portrait by Peale, in Independence Hall, Philadelphia.

Map Showing Development of the West to 1787 . between 410 and 411
Compiled by David Maydole Matteson, A. M.

Autograph of Simon Kenton 412
From original in the New York Public Library (Emmet Collection).

Portrait of Noah Webster 415
From portrait by Sharpless in Independence Hall, Philadelphia.

Portrait of Charles Cotesworth Pinckney . . 418
From portrait by Sharpless in Independence Hall, Philadelphia.

The State House, Philadelphia, 1776 . . . 419
From print in the collection of Mr. C. S. Keyser.

Constitution of the United States . between 436 and 437
Shows the last article and signatures. From the original in the archives in the Department of State, Washington, D. C.

A History of the United States and its People

The Revolution: 1775–1783
The Confederation: 1784–178-

CHAPTER I

THE NEW YORK CAMPAIGN

Hunting for Help

AFTER the shedding of British blood at Concord and Bunker Hill, George III. was more than ever determined to crush the rebellious colonies by force. National and military pride had been aroused and many in England who, in 1774, had bitterly denounced the ministry felt, in 1775, that the Americans must be chastised. Nevertheless, the war was not yet popular; recruiting proceeded slowly and the people would not endure a conscription; troops must be secured in some other way. George III. was elector of Hanover and the custom of the times pointed to the employment of foreign troops.

German Mercenaries

Germany was now split up into nearly three hundred practically independent states, ranging from great kingdoms like Austria and Prussia down to little principalities too small to be shown upon a map. It had long been the custom of the impecunious princelets who ruled over these petty states to hire out their subjects, and German troops were sometimes arrayed on opposite sides in the same battle. Into this promising market a British agent, Colonel William Faucitt, was sent to buy up food for powder and ball at so many pounds per head. His instructions from the earl of Suffolk were "to get as many as you can. . . . Expense is not so much the object in the present emergency as in ordinary cases."

November, 1775

In Brunswick

Faucitt met his first success in Brunswick, then governed by an ambitious and extravagant duke and by his

1776 more thrifty son, Prince Charles William Ferdinand, who had married a sister of George III. Brunswick contained but one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants and its princes were badly in debt. A treaty was soon
January 9 drawn up whereby the duke was to equip and officer for the king of England a corps of three thousand nine hundred and sixty-four infantry and three hundred and thirty-six unmounted dragoons. The king was to pay the troops and to care for their sick and wounded as if they were his own, and the duke was to receive, as levy money, 7*l.* 4*s.* 4½*d.* thirty crowns banco for every common soldier actually delivered. For the corps, the king was to pay an annual 11,517*l.* 17*s.* 1½*d.* rental as long as it was in service and twice that amount for two years after its return to Brunswick.

The Hessian Bargain

Uniform of a Hessian Grenadier of Rall's Regiment
(Drawn by Harry A. Ogden)

From Brunswick, Faucitt hastened to Hesse-Cassel. This state had double the population of Brunswick and was ruled over by a landgrave, Frederick II., who indulged himself in such expensive luxuries as the cast-off mistress of a French duke, French adventurers, and a French theater with a corps de ballet. When Faucitt asked for ten or twelve thousand men, he was agreeably surprised by the offer of a larger number. Without loss of time, a treaty was concluded. The subsidy agreed upon was at the rate of more than a hundred thousand pounds per year, including one year after the return of the troops. In addition to this, the landgrave received more than forty thousand pounds in payment for hospital expenses in the Seven Years' War, which claim had been rejected by the British government fourteen years before. 1 - - 6 108,281. 5.

William, the independent count of Haynau, was the son of the landgrave of Hesse-Cassel by his unfortunate first wife, a sister of George II. When the merry and immoral count had to provide for a natural child, he was accustomed to add a kreutzer (about one cent) to the price of every bag of salt brought by his subjects from the salt-mines. As his acknowledged children of the bar sinister numbered seventy-four, "the poorer of his subjects must have learned to be sparing of their salt." The English king had stationed two Hanoverian battalions in Haynau to insure the independence of the country. In August, 1775, the grateful William had written to his cousin George offering a regiment of infantry, "all sons of the country which your majesty's protection alone assures to me and all ready to sacrifice, with me, their blood for your service." The earl of Suffolk commended "the nobleness of sentiment and affectionate attachment" thus displayed, and Faucitt paid the count a better price for the six hundred and sixty-eight men than he did for any others except those he hired from the count's father. The Haynau Bargain

Faucitt then went outside his royal master's family and leased more men from the prince of Waldeck, the margrave of Ansbach-Bayreuth, and the prince of Anhalt-Zerbst, making with them contracts similar to those previously concluded. Altogether, these principalities furnished about twenty thousand men in 1776 and about nine thousand more before the war was over. In addition, many volunteer recruits and adventurers, attracted by large bounties, high pay, and the prospect of plunder, were obtained and used in filling up British regiments. A large proportion of these German "allies," or "Hessians" as they were collectively called, had seen service Odds and Ends 1776 and were well fitted for the work they were to do. They were well officered and, though most of them came against their will and some of them were actually kidnapped, they earned their pay and keeping and were almost equally hated and dreaded by the Americans. More than a third of them never returned to Germany.

Criticism

The treaties excited much criticism both on the continent and in England. Mirabeau, then a fugitive in Holland, characterized the sale of the soldiers as "the greatest of crimes" and as "an offense against the freedom of nations," and the poet Schiller left an eloquent protest against the traffic. Frederick the Great wrote of selling subjects "as one sells cattle to the shambles." In the English parliament, the treaties were attacked with vehemence. Lord Irnham compared the mercenary princes to Sancho Panza who, if he was a ruler, would prefer that all his subjects should be blackamoors that he might easily turn them into money. On the other hand, it was pointed out that the Swiss had long been in the habit of fighting as mercenaries, that Xenophon's ten thousand Greeks were the same, and that, since the landgrave of Hesse and the duke of Brunswick were so nearly connected with the English throne that their descendants might one day be called to sit upon it, they were justified in lending assistance against the rebels. The opposition produced no important results.

June 18

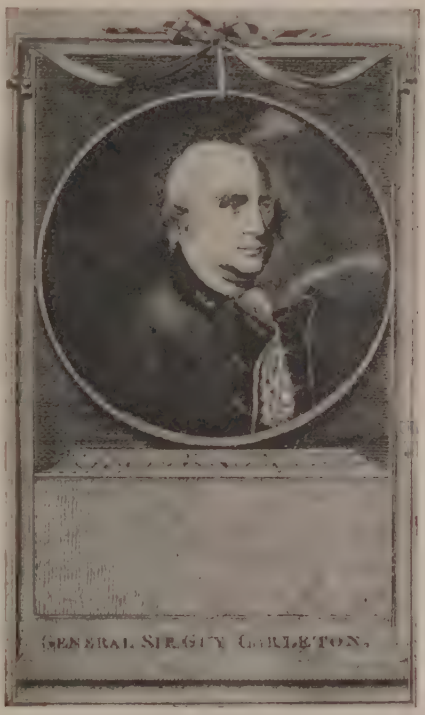

Effect

Time brought retribution upon most of the princely families that were thus guilty of selling their subjects, and the English policy defeated its own end. The hiring of the Hessians made reconciliation hopeless and the declaration of independence inevitable. Nothing did more to nerve the Americans to bitter resistance and to alienate them forever from the mother country. Englishmen themselves recognized this. "Were I an American," cried Lord Chatham, "as I am an Englishman, while a foreign troop was landed in my country, I would never lay down my arms — never — never — never!"

Strategy

The first division of the German troops sailed from England for Quebec in April, 1776; others soon sailed for New York. With their aid, the Americans were to be driven from Canada; then an army under Carleton and Burgoyne was to move up the Richelieu and by way of Lake Champlain and the Hudson until it came in touch with another army that was to operate against New York City. New England, hitherto the chief center of revolt, was thus to be cut off from the other colonies. 1776

Portrait of Guy Carleton
(From a contemporary engraving)

On Lake Champlain

As related in the preceding volume, the Americans had been driven from Canada. The British now followed up their success with an attempt to acquire the mastery of Lake Champlain. Three vessels were taken in pieces, dragged around the rapids of the Richelieu, and rebuilt at Saint Johns. Others were built there and about two hundred flatboats were brought from Montreal. To man this fleet, about seven hundred sailors and some of the best officers were picked from the transports and war-ships in the Saint Lawrence. Meanwhile, largely through the energy of Arnold who had been intrusted with the preparations and the command, the Americans managed to assemble at the head of Lake Champlain (Skenesboro) a fleet of three schooners, one sloop, five row-galleys, and eight gondolas, collecting those already on the lake and building others.

1776 Arnold's second in command was a Connecticut brigadier, and his crews were chiefly landsmen taken from the army.

The First Fight between an American and a British Fleet

Map illustrating the Action on Lake Champlain

On the morning of the eleventh of October, the British fleet, consisting of three broadside vessels, twenty gunboats, and half a dozen other craft, attacked the American vessels between Valcour Island and the western shore. A desperate engagement followed; Arnold displayed his usual intrepidity, but by night, the Americans had lost a gondola and the schooner "Royal Savage" and were blockaded by the enemy who waited for morning in order to give the finishing blow. Before daylight, however, the remaining American boats stole through the British line and made their way southward. The British pursued and, on the thirteenth, came up with them off Split Rock Point. The "Washington" was compelled to surrender; after a running fight of five hours, the "Congress" and four gondolas were chased into a creek on the east side of the lake where Arnold burned them and then, "despite the savages," escaped with their crews through the woods. Five of the American vessels made their way to Ticonderoga, then held by Gates and his army.

FADEN'S PLAN OF THE BATTLE OF VALCOUR ISLAND
(From original in the Library of Congress)

1776 The little American navy on Lake Champlain was
The Laurel Wreath destroyed, "but never," says Mahan, "had any force, big or small, lived to better purpose or died more gloriously." On the fourteenth of October, Carleton was at Crown Point which the Americans had evacuated after the destruction of their fleet. The season was now so late that he did not make any attempt upon Ticonderoga, a grave mistake that astonished friend and foe. Lake Champlain began to freeze unusually early, there were no available roads northward through the forest, no preparations had been made to winter at Crown Point, and there was danger that the British forces would be cut off from their base if they attempted to stay where they were. Consequently, after receiving tidings from Howe October 29 at New York, Carleton evacuated Crown Point and returned to Canada, leaving the conquest of the strategic line of Lake Champlain and the Hudson River for another campaign. "That the Americans were strong enough to impose the capitulation of Saratoga," says Mahan, "was due to the invaluable year of delay, secured to them in 1776 by their little navy on Lake Champlain, created by their indomitable energy, and handled with the indomitable courage of the traitor, Benedict Arnold. That the war spread from America to Europe, from the English channel to the Baltic, from the Bay of Biscay to the Mediterranean, from the West Indies to the Mississippi, and ultimately involved the waters of the remote peninsula of Hindostan, is traceable through Saratoga, to the rude flotilla, which in 1776 anticipated the enemy in the possession of Lake Champlain." 1776

Contemporary engraved View of the Battle of Valcour Island

At New York

On the twenty-fifth of June, Sir William Howe, in the fast sailing frigate "Greyhound," arrived off Sandy Hook from Boston via Halifax, and was warmly welcomed by Governor Tryon. A fleet of one hundred and twenty-seven square-rigged vessels besides smaller crafts bore his nine thousand troops into the lower bay; on the fifth of July, Howe's army landed on Staten Island. On the twelfth, Richard, Lord Howe, rear-admiral and brother of the general, arrived with a strong squadron and nearly one hundred and fifty transports bearing eighty-six hundred Hessian and British troops.

Coat of Arms of Sir William Howe

Sir William Howe

The Howe Brothers

Lord Howe brought olive-branch as well as sword. Before he left England, the ministry had, with the king's reluctant consent, given him and his brother a joint commission to restore peace. It seemed that 1776 if reconciliation was possible the two brothers were fittest to accomplish it. They were grandsons of George II.; they were younger brothers of the lamented officer who had fallen near Ticonderoga in the French war; they were Whigs and the general had spoken in parliament in behalf of the colonists; they were sincerely anxious to effect a reconciliation, of which Lord Howe was so confident that he told Admiral Arbuthnot at Halifax that peace would be made within ten days of his arrival.

A Dead Letter

Howe found his task more difficult than he had anticipated. On the fourteenth of July, a letter containing the king's promise of a full and free pardon to all those who would desist from rebellion was sent up the bay addressed to "George Washington, Esq." Joseph Reed, a Philadelphia lawyer who had been Washington's military secretary and, in June, had taken Gates's place as adjutant-general, noticed the superscription and refused to receive the missive, saying that there was no such person in the army. Six days later, a document, this time addressed to "George Washington, Esq., etc., etc.," was brought up by Howe's adjutant-general, but Washington refused to receive it. The two discussed the question of exchanging prisoners, but on the subject of peace Washington refused to negotiate, saying that he had no authority in the case and that the Americans would not negotiate on any other basis than independence, a thing that the Howes were not authorized to consider.

The British Force

On the first of August, the British forces at New York were increased by the arrival of General Clinton with the troops that he brought back from his unfortunate attempt to take Fort Moultrie. Other reinforcements followed until Howe's army numbered about thirty-two thousand trained soldiers, of whom more than twenty-four thousand were fit for service. Aiding Howe's army was Howe's fleet. General Lee had already declared "that whoever commands the sea must command the town."

The New York Defenses

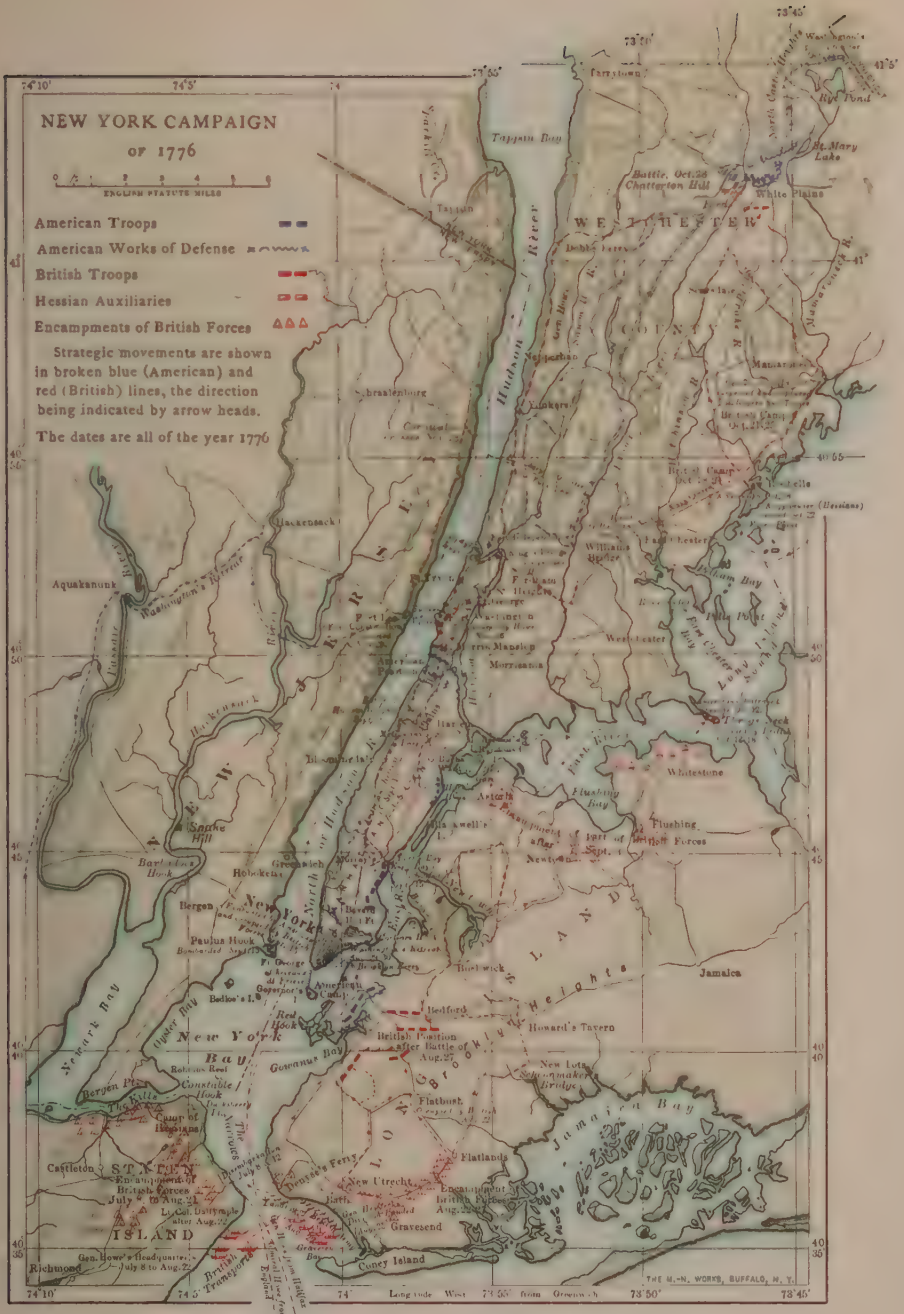

After the evacuation of Boston, Washington had hastened to New York where he arrived on the thirteenth

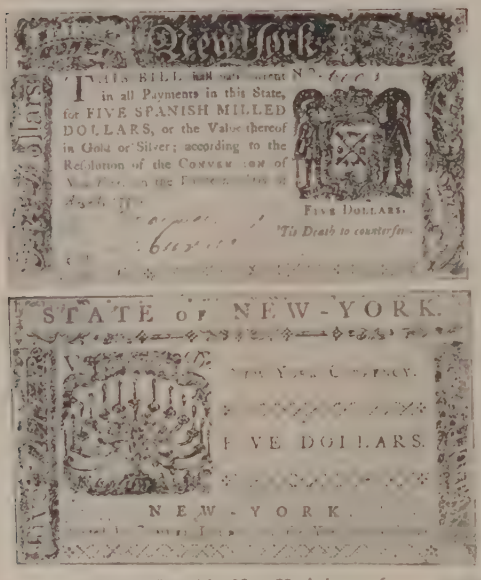

RICHARD, EARL HOWE

(From a mezzotint in the New York Public Library, Emmet Collection. Made from a painting by Copley; published, London, 1794)

General Map of the New York Campaign of 1776
(Prepared from data compiled by Mr. Charles William Burrows)

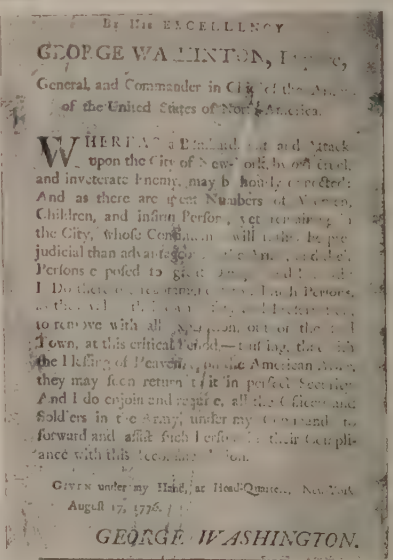

Currency Issued by New York in 1776
(Five-dollar bill, obverse and reverse)

1776 George, the Grand Battery, and the water batteries at every landing on the lower end of Manhattan Island, there was a chain of redoubts just north of the city, about on the line of the Grand street of today. At the northern end of the island, the hills overlooking Kingsbridge were fortified; and works were erected on Long Island. To defend these widely separated fortifications, Washington had, on the twenty-

Washington's Army

of April. Lee's plans for the defense of the city were enlarged. Governor's Island was garrisoned; Paulus Hook on the Jersey shore and Red Hook on Long Island were fortified; and hulks were sunk in the channel between Governor's Island and the lower end of the city. Fort Lee was built at the Palisades and Fort Washington on the eastern side of the river at what is now One Hundred and Eighty-third street, and the intervening channel was obstructed. Besides Fort

By His EXCELLENCY
GEORGE WASHINGTON,
General and Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States of North-America.
GIVEN under my Hand, at Head-Quarters, New-York,
August 17, 1776.
GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Washington's Proclamation to the People of New York

seventh of August, about twenty-eight thousand five hundred men, of whom eight or nine thousand were not available for duty. Twenty-five out of seventy-one regiments or parts of regiments were "continentals;" their men were enlisted under the regulations of congress and their officers were commissioned by that body and not by the states; they were the "regulars" of the Revolution. The other troops were militia, generally ill clad and poorly armed, good raw material but undisciplined. The artillery was mostly old and of varying calibre and pattern.

1776

Continental Line Infantry, showing State Distinctions
(From original drawing by Harry A. Ogden)

Earlier in the month, Heath, Spencer, Sullivan, and Greene had been made major-generals.

August 9

On the morning of the twenty-second of August, General Howe transferred fifteen thousand British and Hessian troops and forty field-pieces from Staten Island to Long Island. To oppose this force, the Americans had on the island not more than eight thousand men most of whom were raw militia, an inadequate supply of artillery, no cavalry, and no naval support. Cornwallis drove back the Pennsylvania riflemen who had been patrolling the coast since May and advanced as far as Flatbush. On the twenty-fourth, Washington wrote to Governor Trumbull of Connecticut asking if it would be "practicable for 1776 your government to throw a body of one thousand or more men across the sound, to harass the enemy in their rear or upon their flanks, . . . securing the stocks of cattle, &c." On the twenty-fifth, General De Heister, a crippled veteran of many campaigns, landed at Gravesend Bay with two more Hessian brigades. Howe's more than twenty thousand men occupied a line extending from the Narrows to Flatlands.

Howe's Army on Long Island

Flag of the First Pennsylvania Rifle Regiment
(Reproduced, by the Lumiere process of color photography, from the original in the State House at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania)

The American Defenses

The Americans upon the island were in a dangerous position; if the British fleet should force its way into the East River their retreat would be cut off. Yet, if New York was to remain in American hands, it was necessary that Brooklyn Heights should be held, for they dominated the city. General Nathanael Greene with about seven thousand men had spent the summer in fortifying the position. Back of Brooklyn village he had built a line of intrenchments and redoubts from Gowanus Cove on the south to Wallabout Bay on the north, a distance of a little less than a mile. Each flank of these inner works was well protected by creeks and morasses. Two or three miles beyond were the Brooklyn Heights, a difficult, heavily wooded ridge, practically passable by troops with artillery only at the Narrows road near the bay, at Flatbush Pass, about three miles to the eastward, and at Jamaica

Pass, two or three miles still beyond. Unfortunately, Greene, who was a capable officer and familiar with the situation, was prostrated by the prevailing fever; on the twentieth of August he was succeeded by Sullivan. On the twenty-fourth, Washington placed

Private of Artillery, Continental Line
(From original drawing by Harry A. Ogden)

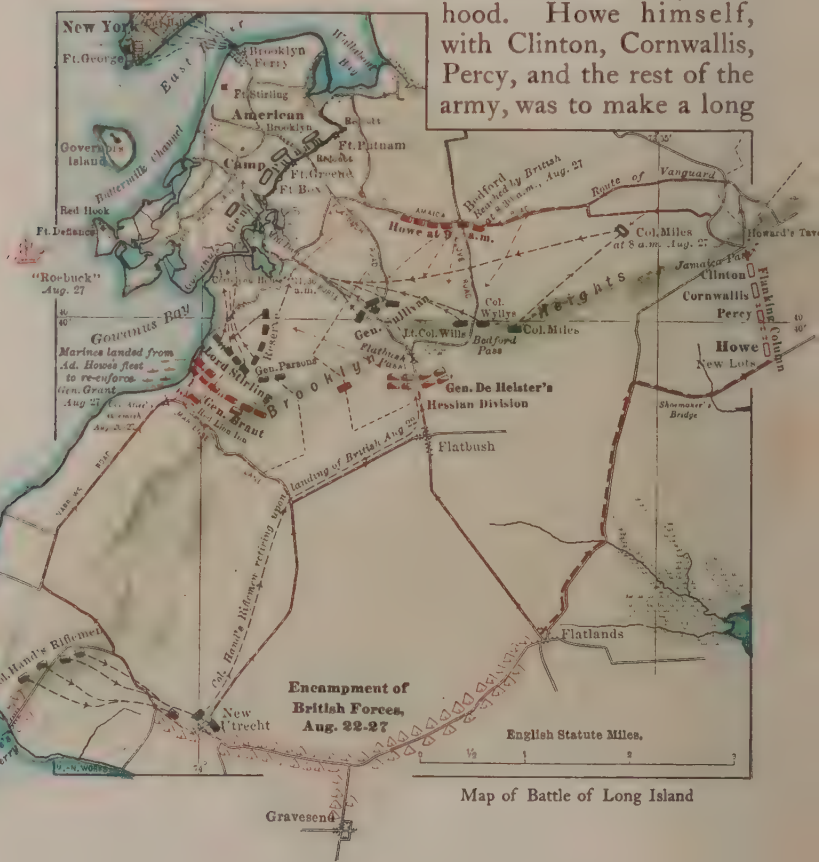

Coat of Arms of Israel Putnam

Putnam in command; on the twenty-fifth, he sent him written instructions; on the twenty-sixth, he crossed over to the island and made a personal inspection of the intrenchments and the outposts. Putnam was devoted, honest, and courageous, but he knew almost nothing of the arrangements for defense and little of scientific warfare. He can hardly be said to have exercised general command on the day of the battle that was at hand.

1776 Howe's Plans

With forces outnumbering the Americans three to one and thoroughly informed by Tories of the position of the enemy, Howe planned to make the attack in three columns. General Grant, whom we met at Fort Duquesne and again in the Cherokee country, was to advance with two brigades, a regiment of Highlanders, and two companies of New York Tories along the Narrows road against the American right. General De Heister with yagers and three German brigades was to move along the Flatbush road and attack the Americans in that neighborhood. Howe himself, with Clinton, Cornwallis, Percy, and the rest of the army, was to make a long detour, seize the Jamaica road, and attack the American outer line in the rear. Against an adequate army ably led, such tactics would have been extremely hazardous. 1776

Somebody Blundered

On the twenty-sixth, De Heister's Hessians occupied Flatbush and threatened the pass in front, which Sullivan held with an intrenched force. At nine o'clock in the evening, Clinton's flanking column, guided by three Flatbush Tories, moved from Flatlands toward the Jamaica Pass near which, about three in the morning of the twenty-seventh, they captured five mounted officers who were supposed to be doing patrol duty. Finding no other obstruction at the pass, the British marched into the American rear by the Jamaica road, "a route we never dreamed of," as one of the American officers innocently wrote. By this maneuver, the American advanced forces were completely outflanked and surprised and the battle was really decided before the fighting had begun.

Stirling's Skirmish

Meanwhile, General Grant, on the British left, had moved forward as planned and secured the Stirling

(From original painting owned by Dr. Robert Watts)

1776 pass in front of him by daybreak. Putnam sent Lord Stirling with fifteen hundred troops to oppose him, and slight skirmishes followed for several hours in what is now Greenwood Cemetery. Considering that they were outnumbered four to one, Stirling's men seemed to be doing well; Grant probably did not desire to drive them from their position until the flanking column had gained their rear.

Sullivan and De Heister

In the British center, De Heister and his Hessians had lain on their arms directly in front of Sullivan, at the Flatbush pass. When Clinton descended from the wooded hills and attacked the Americans on the plain at Bedford, his guns were heard and understood by De Heister. The Hessians pushed promptly forward and Sullivan was caught in the net. Ten thousand British and four thousand Hessians were too many for fewer than three thousand Americans and Sullivan ordered a retreat. On the way, they were met by Clinton's light infantry and dragoons who drove them back upon the Hessian bayonets. Fighting hand to hand with the foe, Sullivan's men were driven backward and forward between De Heister's full ranks on the one side and Clinton's on the other. Many cut their way through the hedge of bayonets and sabres, after which there was a lively chase over the hills and through the woods just outside the Brooklyn lines. Had the pursuing grenadiers then stormed Fort Putnam, an easy victory would doubtless have been won. Many were killed, wounded, or captured and Sullivan was taken prisoner. Washington had come over from New York and saw the calamity that he could not avert.

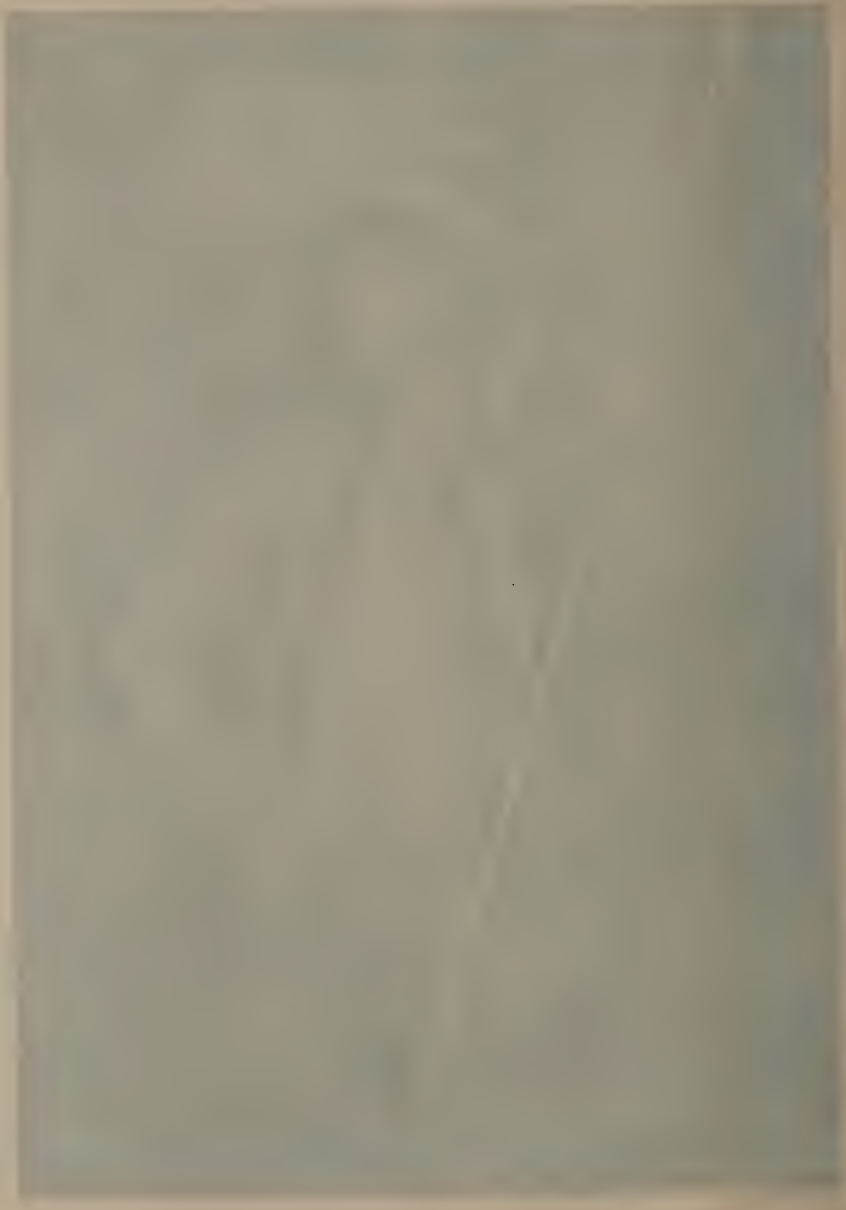

Stirling and Grant

On the American right, Stirling soon found his force shut in between Grant and Cornwallis while Gowanus Creek and a marsh and a fast-rising tide were behind him. To gain time, he took a small force of Marylanders and charged against the enemy while the greater number of his men worked their way across the muddy stream, or sank in its turbid waters or in the deep mud of its banks. For twenty minutes there was a sharp

MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN SULLIVAN

(From a mezzotint in the New York Public Library, Emmet Collection)

conflict between Cornwallis's force and the American forlorn hope, but in the end the survivors of the gallant band were dispersed or captured. 1776

By two o'clock, the fighting was at an end. The demoralized Americans who escaped from the net found shelter behind the intrenched line, in what is now the heart of Brooklyn. Howe had still six hours of daylight, but instead of pressing forward to assault the works, he waited until the following day, broke ground for a regular siege, and began a cannonade. The English historian, Lord Mahon, says that by his ill-timed caution the English general flung away the opportunity of destroying the flower of the American army. But Howe at Bunker Hill had seen Americans defend intrenchments and the "ill-timed caution" may have been born of the prudence that he gained from that day's experience. This is the common explanation of his failure to assault, but he may have hoped that the northeast wind that had prevented the war-ships from coming up the bay would change so that they could enter the East River. He certainly had counted upon such aid from the fleet. In fact, while the morning fight was in progress, five ships of the line, under command of Sir Peter Parker, made an unsuccessful effort to beat up the bay, and one ship of smaller size did work up far enough to injure the breastworks and to dismount some of the guns of the inadequate battery at Red Hook. Had Sir Peter Parker been successful, the American force in Brooklyn would have been in a trap and would have been forced to surrender without much further loss of life.

Howe's ill-timed Caution

Additional troops were brought across the river and, by the morning of the twenty-eighth, Washington had nine or ten thousand men on Long Island. The morning was lowering and presently a drenching rain set in. It was a case of four to one, but the expected assault was not made. Charles Francis Adams says that "when it came to dilatoriness, Sir William Howe seems always to have proved himself equal to any occasion." Facing the danger that that "providential" northeast wind would

The Better Part of Valor

1776 die out and that the British fleet would enter the East River, Washington recognized his mistake and prepared to extricate himself from its consequences. In the early evening of the twenty-ninth, he submitted a plan of retreat to a council of war that unanimously accepted it. On the morning of the same day, he had through Mifflin, the quartermaster-general, ordered General Heath at Kingsbridge to send "every flat bottomed boat and other craft at your post, fit for transporting troops, down to New York as soon as possible." It is probable that orders had been previously issued to provide transportation for the retreat if one became necessary. At all events, every available boat was impressed, and the flotilla was wisely manned with Hutchinson's men from Salem and Colonel Glover's "amphibious regiment" from Marblehead.

Cartridge-box used in the American Revolution

Escape

In the early evening of the twenty-ninth, the still persisting northeast wind made it almost impossible to use the sailing craft, but, about eleven o'clock, the gale died down and changed into a gentle southwest breeze that proved of great assistance. Just before dawn, "Providence further interposed in favor of the retreating army by sending a thick fog," under cover of which, soon after sunrise of the thirtieth, the last regiment crossed in safety. All the stores and artillery were saved except a few heavy pieces. The last boat that crossed bore the commander-in-chief. The British were not vigilant; there were no inquisitive scouts along the lines, or prowling patrol boats in the East River. Howe and his officers knew nothing of what was going on until the Americans were safe across the river, then a thousand feet wider than it is today; of course, they were deeply morti-

FOR the Encouragement of thoſe that ſhall Inliſt in the Continental Army—The CONGRESS in their Reſolves of September 16*th*, 18*th*, 19*th*, October 8*th*, and November 12*th*, 1776, Engage,

THAT Twenty Dollars be given as a Bounty to each Non-Commiſſioned Officer and Private Soldier who ſhall Inliſt to ſerve for the Term of Three Years.

That each Non-Commiſſioned Officer and private Soldier ſhall annually receive a Suit of Cloaths, to conſiſt for the preſent Year, of Two Linnen Hunting Shirts, Two Pair of Overalls, a Leathern or Woollen Waiſtcoat with Sleeves, One Pair of Breeches, a Hat or Leather Cap, Two Shirts, Two Pair of Hoſe, and Two Pair of Shoes, amounting in the whole to the Value of Twenty Dollars, or that Sum to be paid to each Soldier who ſhall procure thoſe Articles for himſelf, and produces a Certificate thereof from the Captain of the Company to which he belongs, to the Pay Maſter of the Regiment.

That each Non-Commiſſioned Officer and private Soldier who ſhall Inliſt and engage to continue in the Service to the Cloſe of the War, or until diſcharged by CONGRESS, ſhall receive in Addition to the above Encouragement, ONE HUNDRED ACRES OF LAND, and if any are Slain by the Enemy, the Repreſentatives of ſuch Soldiers ſhall be intitled to the aforeſaid Hundred Acres of Land.

And for their further Encouragement, the State of Maſſachuſetts-Bay, has, by a Reſolve of November 25 laſt, engaged,

That each Non Commiſſioned Officer and private Soldier who ſhall Inliſt into the Continental Army, either during the War, or for the Term of Three Years, as Part of the Quota of Men aſſigned this State, the Sum of Twenty Pounds on his paſſing Muſter, the ſaid Twenty Pounds to be paid in Treaſurer's Notes of Ten Pounds each, payable to the Poſſeſſor in Four Years, with Intereſt to be paid annually, at the Rate of Six per Cent.

In the Houſe of REPRESENTATIVES, Dec. 4. 1776.

THE foregoing Extracts were Read and Ordered to be Printed.

JAMES WARREN, Speaker.

BROADSIDE TO ENCOURAGE ENLISTMENT IN THE CONTINENTAL ARMY
(From a copy in the Boston Public Library)

fied by the escape of the prey that they thought secure. 1776
Lossing has compared the favoring fog to the shield of the Almighty, and more matter-of-fact military critics have quoted Frederick of Prussia's reference to such favoring circumstances as instances of luck in warfare.

After the Battle

Howe's victory had cost the British in killed, wounded, and missing about four hundred. The loss of the Americans was much heavier, though not as much so as has often been stated. According to authoritative accounts, their total loss was not above one thousand. Of these, fifty-six were killed, one hundred and sixty-six were wounded, and the rest were taken prisoners. There was no such slaughter as has sometimes been pictured nor was there any "massacre" by the Hessians. On the thirty-first, Howe marched his army from the battle-field of the twenty-seventh to the vicinity of Newtown, nearer to Hell Gate and Long Island Sound, and then took a two weeks' rest from active warfare.

Washington's Opinion of Militia

Although New York was practically lost with the loss of Long Island, Washington continued to occupy Manhattan. He began moving his stores to Kingsbridge and beyond and asked congress if he should burn the city. On the second of September, he wrote to congress: "Till of late I had no doubt in my own mind of defending this place; nor should I have yet, if the men would do their duty; but this I despair of." Most of these men were poorly armed militia who had been away from home but a few weeks. Washington was "obliged to confess my want of confidence in the generality of the troops" and urged congress to enlist men for the war. "Men who have been free and subject to no control cannot be reduced to order in an instant." A few weeks later, he wrote again: "To place any dependence upon militia is assuredly resting upon a broken staff." September 24

Howe again Proffers the Olive Branch

Hoping that his victory would enable him to make peace, Lord Howe sent the captured Sullivan to Philadelphia to urge congress to send, as private persons, some of its members to confer with him. The suggestion brought by Sullivan, a "decoy duck" John Adams

1776 unjustly called him, caused a warm debate, but Adams, Rutledge, and Franklin were sent to Staten Island as a congressional committee to confer with Howe. Howe received them

General Sullivan's Vest

September 11 courteously although he had no power to confer with them except as Americans of influence. With characteristic diplomacy, Franklin was willing that Howe should consider them as he thought best, they reserving the right to consider themselves as what they really were, and Adams was willing to be considered "anything but a British subject." Nothing came of the conference and, as a last effort, Howe issued a proclamation announcing that the British government was ready to reconsider the acts and instructions that had brought on the war and asking all fair-minded people if it would not be wiser to return to their allegiance and accept the blessings of peace than "to offer up their lives as a sacrifice to the unjust and precarious cause in which they were engaged." The proclamation produced little or no effect and Howe took up the task of capturing New York.

September 19

With British troops on Brooklyn Heights and British ships in the East River and the Hudson, the abandonment of New York was a necessity and, on the twelfth of September, an American council of war decided to give up the city. The evacuation, however, was effected with difficulty, for, on the fifteenth, Howe sent a force under Clinton across the East River to Kips Bay at the foot of the present Thirty-fourth street. Awed by a "thundering rattle" from the ships of war, the American troops in that vicinity retreated in a panic. At the first sound of the guns, Washington rode from his headquarters in the Morris mansion near what is One Hundred and Sixtieth street east of Tenth avenue (later the residence of Madame Jumel) to the front and made an unsuccessful effort to rally the fugitives. This retreat left about four thousand of the American militia further down the island in danger of being cut off, but General Putnam, to whose division they belonged, marched them up the west side of the island

1776

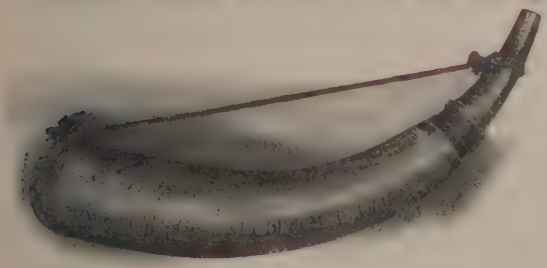

The British Take New York

Map of the Battle of Harlem Heights

September 15

Samuel Selden's Powder-horn

1776 and managed to extricate the brigade without substantial loss in men; most of the heavy artillery and part of the stores and provisions had to be left behind. The story goes that General Howe and Governor Tryon and others were entertained at luncheon at Murray Hill, then a country farmstead but "now the center of much brownstone magnificence." The day was so "insupportably hot," the cake and Madeira were so palatable, and the charming hostess and her daughter so delightful that the officers tarried two hours or more—until Putnam and his men were out of danger. For the sake of his mother and his sister, we may well forgive Lindley Murray for his English grammar. Late in the afternoon, a detachment from the fleet took possession of the city, and all of Manhattan below Harlem was in the possession of the British.

The Morris Mansion

The Battle of Harlem Heights

The American lines now extended across Manhattan Island from Harlem to the Hudson, while the British encampment also extended across the island with their right at Horns Hook and their left "at the North River near to Bloomingdale;" there were British men-of-war on either flank of Howe's line. Washington had about nine thousand men including "Knowlton's Rangers," a body of about one hundred and twenty volunteers who were expected to be constantly at the front watching the movements of the enemy. The commander of the rangers was the Thomas Knowlton whom we met at Bunker Hill. Early in the morning of the sixteenth, Washington sent Knowlton and his men to make a reconnaissance —a movement that brought on, in the vicinity of the site of Grant's tomb and Columbia University, a spirited action known as the battle of Harlem Heights, an open-field affair, "up and down hill, and over fields and fences, and through lanes and orchards." In the end, the British were driven back with a loss somewhat greater than that of the Americans; Knowlton was among the killed. The conflict did much to restore the confidence of the Americans; Washington said that it cheered his men "prodigiously." 1776

Thomas Knowlton
(From Trumbull's historic painting of the Battle of Bunker Hill, in collection of Yale University)

A Tory Refuge

After the British occupation of the city, New York became the chief sanctuary of the hunted Tories. The Whigs in the city and on Long Island were disarmed, forced to take the oath of allegiance, and received, measure for measure, the persecution they had visited upon their loyalist neighbors. "Their cattle were stolen, their orchards cut down for firewood," and their churches were sometimes burned or used for stables or disfigured by having their steeples sawn off by mischief-1776 loving Tories. As most of the Episcopalians in the colony were Tories, their churches were spared except in cases of necessity, but the Presbyterians, nearly all of whom were Whigs, were less fortunate. This division along religious lines, noticeable chiefly in New England and New York, added to the rancor of the struggle. Not all of the excesses are chargeable to the British or to the loyalists.

Liberty Pole Tablet

Brother Jonathan

He who examines Washington's correspondence of this period must notice the frequency with which he wrote to Governor Trumbull of Connecticut. Part of this was doubtless due to the geographical position of the state but, in a large measure, it was based upon the personality of the executive. When Washington wrote to Trumbull of the weakness of his army, the governor assembled his committee of safety, called for nine more regiments, and to those who were not yet enrolled said: "Join yourselves to one of your companies now ordered to New York, or form yourselves into distinct companies and choose captains forthwith. March on; this shall be your warrant. May the God of the armies of Israel be your leader." Jonathan

August, 1776

Jon. Trumbull

Trumbull was governor of Connecticut from 1769 to 1783, the only colonial governor who espoused the people's cause and one of Washington's main pillars of support. It is said that, in moments of perplexity, the general often exclaimed, "Let us hear what Brother Jonathan says," and that "Brother Jonathan" thus became the accepted designation of the personified United States. The famous little office on Lebanon Hill is carefully preserved by the Sons of the American Revolution. 1776

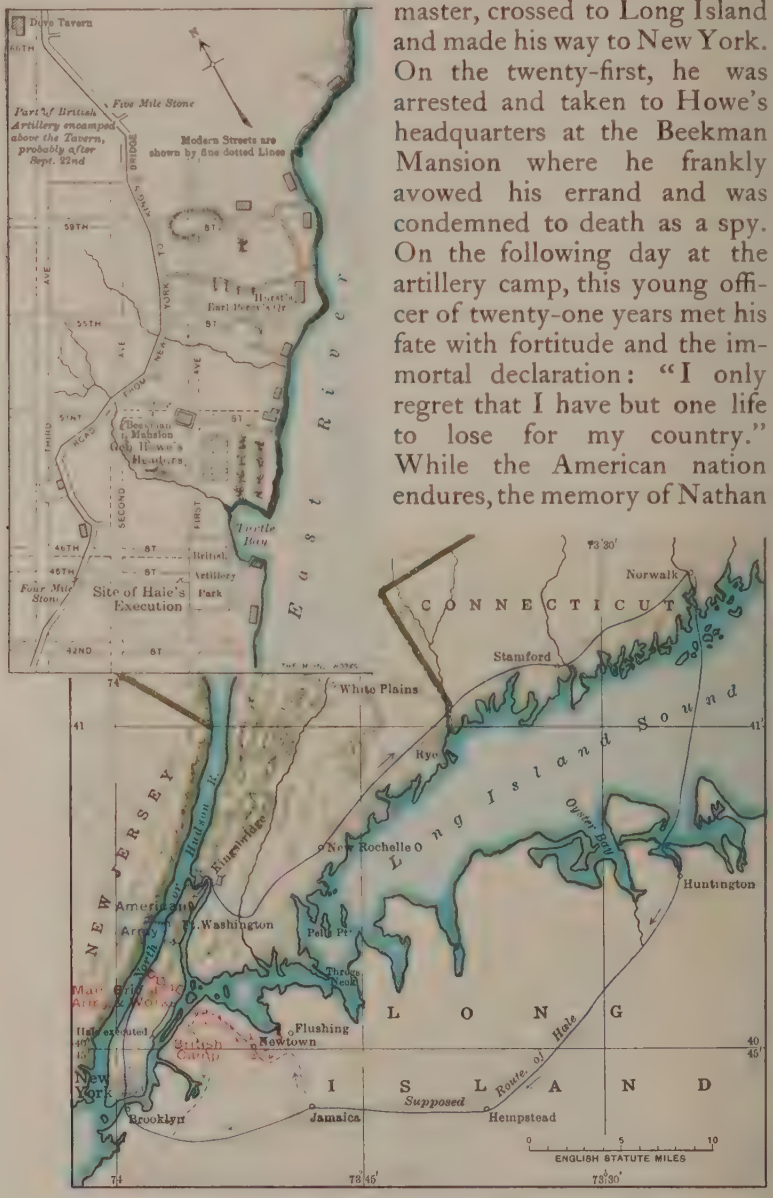

The Martyr Spy

Five days after the battle of Harlem Heights, a fire broke out in the city and consumed five hundred houses that would have made snug winter quarters for the British troops, but the day is chiefly remembered because of the arrest of Nathan Hale, a Connecticut schoolmaster who had hastened to the American lines at Boston and was now a captain in the newly organized "Knowlton's Rangers." Before the British crossed the East River, Washington had been very anxious to find out Howe's intentions and Hale tendered his services to that end. "I am fully sensible of the consequences of discovery and capture," he said to a brother officer, and added: "I am not influenced by the expectation of promotion or pecuniary reward. I wish to be useful, and every kind of service necessary to the public good becomes honorable by being necessary." With Washington's approval and instructions, Hale set out in the second week of September, went to Stamford on the Connecticut shore, disguised himself as a schoolmaster, crossed to Long Island and made his way to New York. On the twenty-first, he was arrested and taken to Howe's headquarters at the Beekman Mansion where he frankly avowed his errand and was condemned to death as a spy. On the following day at the artillery camp, this young officer of twenty-one years met his fate with fortitude and the immortal declaration: "I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country." While the American nation endures, the memory of Nathan Hale will be cherished in the land for which he gladly gave his life; his "disgraceful" death is now counted as his greatest glory.

Nathan Hale's Camp Basket

Maps showing Route of Nathan Hale into the British Lines and Section of New York City where he was Executed

Soon after the affair at Harlem Heights, General Greene was sent with a brigade to hold Fort Lee on the west bank of the Hudson. For about three weeks, the two main armies "continued at gaze." The problem of destroying Washington's command and thereby ending the war was now more difficult than it had been at

1776

Washington Abandons Manhattan Island

Page from Diary of a British Officer, recording Hale's Execution

Your Friend and Constant Well-wisher
Nathan Hale

New London May 2
D 1776,

Your loving Brother
Nathan Hale.

Two Autographs of Nathan Hale: Ornate, or Schoolmaster's, and Ordinary Autograph

1776 Brooklyn. The triple line of fortifications extending across the upper end of the island from the Hudson to the Harlem was made so strong that Howe did not care to venture an assault; he therefore attempted a flank movement. Leaving Percy with two brigades to defend New York, and with the intention of occupying the Westchester roads and cutting off Washington's retreat, Howe transported his main army

October 12 up the East River through Hell Gate to Throg's Neck, a tongue of land that was separated from the mainland by a narrow creek and a marsh that was overflowed at high tide. But the Americans had destroyed the bridge between the neck and the mainland and had erected intrenchments that held the British on the peninsula for six days. Meanwhile, Washington abandoned his positions on Manhattan Island with the exception of Fort Washington and its outworks, fell back with his army, and fortified near White Plains. Sullivan and Stirling, having been exchanged, now rejoined the army and Lee returned from South Carolina.

Hale Family Tombstone at Coventry, Connecticut

Washington's Headquarters at White Plains

The Battle of Pell's Point

About one o'clock in the morning of the eighteenth, Howe crossed over to Pell's Point, near which some Massachusetts troops had encamped the night before. In the absence of General

James Clinton, the command was held by Colonel John Glover. The brigade consisted of four skeleton regiments with a total of seven hundred and fifty men; one of the four was Glover's own famous regiment of fishermen. As Howe advanced with four thousand, Glover sent a company of forty to hold them in check until the main body of his brigade could be "disposed of to advantage." The "amphibious" regiment and the three cannons were left in reserve at the Hutchinson River, a sinuous, tide-water stream named in memory of Anne Hutchinson, the Massachusetts exile of 1637, who, in this lonely spot, perished by Indian massacre in 1643; the other three regiments, fewer than six hundred effective men, took position behind the substantial stone walls that fenced the roadway. In some respects, the fight that followed was Bunker Hill over again, but the bulldog tenacity of the British and the Hessians was much in evidence and the American Six Hundred fell back beyond the Hutchinson River, their retreat being covered by Glover's regiment and the artillery. Howe made no attempt to cross the stream and went into camp to await reinforcements. The contrast between the numbers engaged was striking, but the difference in losses sustained is almost beyond belief. Glover reported six privates killed and about a dozen wounded. The losses of the enemy were mostly among the Hessians and the total has been estimated at from eight hundred to a

1776

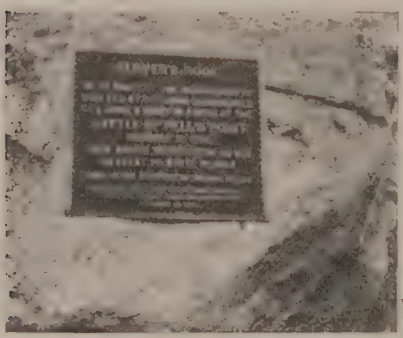

John Glover
Brigadier General

(From painting in possession of Mrs. Henry E. Waite)

1776 thousand. The Americans were well sheltered, no flanking movement was attempted, and much of the firing was at short range. Colonel Baldwin of the Massachusetts twenty-sixth said: "Our troops were as calm and steady as though expecting a shot at a flock of pigeons." Concerning the estimate above recorded, Dawson says: "It is difficult to believe that four hundred Americans, familiar with the use of firearms, sheltered by ample defences from which they could fire deliberately and with their guns rested on the tops, could have fired volley after volley into a large body of men, massed in a compact column in a narrow roadway, without having inflicted as extended damage as this." On the morning of the nineteenth, Glover and his men retreated towards Yonkers. The all-day encounter had an excellent moral effect on the Americans and the delay that it caused Howe was valuable to Washington who, in general orders, congratulated "Col. Glover and the officers and men who were with him in the skirmish on Friday last." The battle-field is within the limits of Pelham Bay Park, a suburb of Mount Vernon.

October 21

"Glover's Rock" and Memorial Tablet

The Battle of White Plains

October 22

On the twenty-first, Howe advanced his right and center two miles beyond New Rochelle. Being reinforced by a strong force of Hessians under General Knyphausen and foiled in his attempt to get in Washington's rear, he decided to attempt an attack in front. On the twenty-eighth of October, the British stormed the American outpost at Chatterton Hill then held by continentals and militia under Brigadier-general Alexander Macdougall, and Captain Alexander Hamilton with an artillery company and two guns. The brisk conflict that ensued is commonly known as the battle of White Plains. The British finally succeeded in carrying the hill, but with a loss considerably greater than that of the Americans. Howe thought it wise to wait for reinforcements before risking a decisive battle. Lord Percy arrived with a strong detachment on the thirtieth and the next day was set for the attack. But, on the thirty-first, a rainstorm delayed Howe's proposed action and that night Washington withdrew his army to so strong a position on the heights of North Castle (now Newcastle) that the British general did not venture to attack him.

1776

Map of the Battle of White Plains

The Falkeneer (Falconeer) House at White Plains, Headquarters of British officers (no longer standing)

On the Hudson

Howe then changed his plan and marched to Dobbs Ferry on the Hudson whence he could either attack Fort Washington or cross into New Jersey and threaten Philadelphia. To meet this movement, Putnam was sent with five thousand men into New Jersey, and Heath to Peekskill with three thousand to guard the entrance to the Highlands; Lee was left with seven thousand at 1776 North Castle to coöperate with Washington as Howe's intentions became apparent.

Congressional Meddling and Muddling

As early as the ninth of October, two British frigates had passed the obstructions in the Hudson River between Fort Washington and Fort Lee. Other vessels made the passage on the seventh of November, showing that the forts were of little use and might well be abandoned. On the eighth, Washington wrote to General Greene who was in command of both forts that he did not think it "prudent to hazard the Men and Stores at Mount Washington; but, as you are on the spot, leave it to you to give such orders, as to evacuating Mount Washington, as you may judge best." While Washington was up the river, instructions came from congress to the effect that the place must not be abandoned except under dire necessity. Greene did not feel at liberty to disregard the orders of congress. He therefore reinforced the garrison and awaited Washington's return—"the worst thing possible." Washington arrived at Fort Lee on the fourteenth; on the fifteenth, Howe appeared before Fort Washington with an overwhelming force and demanded

Map of the Action at Fort Washington

Topographical Map of the North Part
of
NEW YORK ISLAND,
Exhibiting the PLAN of FORT WASHINGTON, now
FORT KNYPHAUSEN,
With the Rebels Lines to the Southward, which were Forced by the Troops under the Command of
THE
R. Hon.ble EARL PERCY on the 16th Nov.r
immediately after by Order of his Lordship
By CLAUDE JOSEPH SAUTHIER Engraver to the the Attack made to the North by the Hessians under the Command of Lieut.r Gen.l Knyphausen Published by Permission of the R.t Hon.ble the COMMISSIONERS of TRADE & PLANTATIONS
HUDSONS
CHESTER COUNTY
Very High ston
A Fort Yeat under Lt.nt Col.o Knyphausen by Detachments from the Hessians & his Lords the Brigad.r Mathews and the Regiment of Waldeck
C Fort Yeat marked as a Point by the 1st Rebels D Fort Yeat by the Hessians & British and the

FADEN'S MAP OF NORTHERN NEW YORK

(From The North American Atlas in collection of the New York Historical Society) a surrender, with the alternative "to be put to the sword." 1776

Howe Takes Fort Washington

Colonel Robert Magaw, who was in immediate command at Fort Washington, returned a defiant answer, but his three thousand men were too many for the shelter of the hastily built and feeble fort and too few successfully to defend it and all its outworks. The assault of the sixteenth was skilfully planned and admirably executed. After a sharp struggle, the Americans, outnumbered five to one, were driven from their outer defenses into the fort. Colonel Magaw asked for a five hours' parley; half an hour was given, and surrender came soon after. The victory cost the British about four hundred and fifty in killed and wounded. Only about one hundred and fifty Americans fell, but more than twenty-six hundred yielded themselves prisoners, together with many small arms, a large supply of stores and ammunition, and more than forty cannons. Howe had not the heart to carry out his threat of the day before; some of the Hessians, enraged by the resistance, began bayoneting the prisoners but were forced to desist.

Autograph of Robert Magaw

Margaret Corbin Tablet

Per Aspera ad Astra

The capture of Fort Washington was perhaps the most disastrous blow suffered by the Americans in the course of the war. Its fall brought the New York campaign to an end. Long Island and New York City had been lost, and the lower Hudson and 1776 the waters of the sound were controlled by the British fleet. More than two hundred cannons and more than four thousand men had been captured, nearly six hundred men had been killed or wounded, and many had died of disease. Yet these months of disaster had their compensations. Considering its strength, the British army had accomplished less than might have been expected. Equally important was the fact that the American officers and men were learning to be soldiers. The campaign offered a series of first experiences to the American commander. "Rather a slow man, naturally," and with "none of that insight which causes certain commanders in presence of an enemy — they know not why — instinctively to do the right thing at the right moment," Washington had made mistakes both in strategy and tactics, but through those mistakes he learned. In the school of experience, he developed into a commander-in-chief so safe and so successful that he can stand out and be painted as he was without any of the glamour that has dazzled some historians, or any hiding of "that kindly element of human nature and human weakness of which over-zealous panegyrists have done much to deprive him."

CHAPTER II

TRENTON AND PRINCETON—CONGRESS

FOLLOWING up the British success at Fort Washington, Cornwallis with five or six thousand men made a landing on the New Jersey shore nearly opposite Yonkers and marched down the western bank against the now useless Fort Lee. The Americans precipitately crossed the Hackensack, leaving behind a large quantity of commissary stores, camp equipage and baggage, and more than thirty cannons; "the Ammunition had been happily got away," Washington reported. November 20, 1776

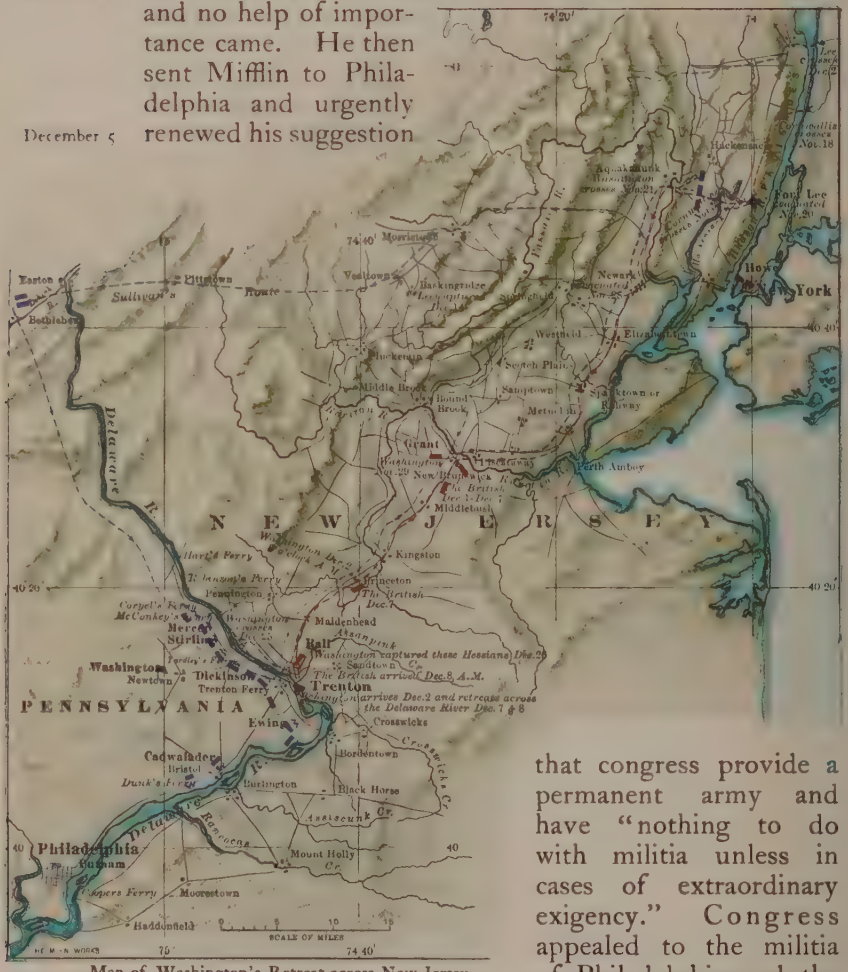

Fearing that he would be hemmed in between the Hackensack and the Passaic rivers, Washington crossed the latter and marched to Newark where he stayed five days. As he moved out of one end of Newark on the twenty-eighth, Cornwallis came in at the other. The next day, at Brunswick, the enlistments of the Maryland and New Jersey militia expired and, despite appeals, nearly all of them set out for home. As the British crossed the Raritan, Washington, with fewer than three thousand men, again fell back. Leaving Stirling with two brigades at Princeton to watch the enemy, he continued his march to Trenton and soon had his scanty stores and baggage across the Delaware. Luckily for him, Howe's orders to Cornwallis did not permit pursuit beyond Brunswick. The Retreat across New Jersey November 21 — December 1 — December 2

During his retreat, the condition of his army had given Washington great anxiety. The men were disheartened, desertions were numerous, and, in disregard of repeated New Jersey Paralysis

1776 orders, Lee had failed to bring up his division. Washington made appeal to the authorities of New Jersey, but December 2 the members of the legislature dispersed to their homes and no help of importance came. He then sent Mifflin to Philadelphia and urgently

December 5 renewed his suggestion

Map of Washington's Retreat across New Jersey

that congress provide a permanent army and have "nothing to do with militia unless in cases of extraordinary exigency." Congress appealed to the militia of Philadelphia and the nearest counties and sent to all parts of the country for reinforcements and supplies. At Trenton, a German battalion and about a thousand militia who had responded

THE LANDING OF THE BRITISH FORCES IN (Close facsimile of original drawing formerly owned by Francis Rawdon Hasting staff at that time. After the death of his grandson, the late Marquis of H Dr. Thomas Addis Emmet, whose collection of rare drawings, engraving most complete collection of its kind in the world

THE JERSEYS, NOVEMBER 20, 1776 better known as Lord Rawdon, who served as officer on Cornwallis's stings, this and other historical sketches passed into the hands of , maps, and autographs, illustrative of American history — the – is in the New York Public Library) to Mifflin's appeals joined the army. On the sixth of December, General Greene returned with twelve hundred men to Princeton where Stirling still was and, that night or early the next morning, Washington set out with a small force to join him. 1776

Howe Offers Amnesty November 30

Meanwhile, the Howe brothers issued a proclamation offering, for sixty days, pardon to all who would renounce the cause of independence. The offer was accepted by about twenty-seven hundred persons, including Samuel Tucker of New Jersey, president of the committee of safety, and Joseph Galloway of Pennsylvania, late of the continental congress. Washington wrote to his brother saying that "the conduct of the Jerseys has been most Infamous. Instead of turning out to defend their country, & affording aid to our army, they are making their submissions as fast as they can." But the influence of the proclamation was soon neutralized by the behavior of the British and Hessian troops who plundered houses, subjected women to indignities, and transferred from Europe to New Jersey the worst horrors of invasion by a foreign army.

IN COUNCIL OF SAFETY,

PHILADELPHIA, December 8, 1776.

SIR,

THERE is certain intelligence of General Howe's army being yesterday on its march from Brunswick to Princetown, which puts it beyond a doubt that he intends for this city. This glorious opportunity of signalizing himself in defence of our country, and securing the Rights of America forever, will be seized by every man who has a spark of patriotic fire in his bosom. We therefore call upon you to march the Militia under your command, with all possible expedition to this city, and bring with you as many waggons as you can possibly procure, which you are hereby authorized to impress, if they are not be had otherwise. Delay not a moment, as the salvation of this city and all you hold most dear to the ruffian hands of the enemy, whose cruelties are without distinction and unequalled.

By order of the Council,

DAVID RITTENHOUSE, Vice President

To the COLONELS or COMMANDING OFFICERS of the respective Battalions of this STATE.

TWO O'CLOCK, P. M.

THE Enemy are at Trenton, and all the City Militia are marched to meet them.

Broadside by the Philadelphia Council of Safety, asking Colonels and Commanding Officers of the State to be in Readiness to meet the Enemy

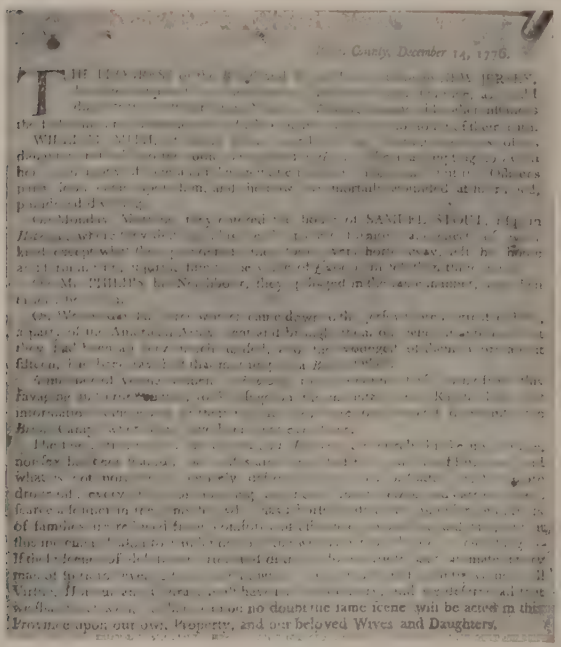

Howe's Advance to Trenton

Encouraged by the easy advance in New Jersey, Howe joined Cornwallis at Brunswick and pushed on to Princeton, forcing Greene and Stirling to retreat before Washington had arrived. By Sunday, the eighth, the American army was on the west side of the Delaware; before they were all 1776 across, the British marched into Trenton. Some of Howe's army criticised his easy pace and to one of them it seemed as if he "had calculated with the greatest accuracy the exact time necessary for his enemy to make his escape." As Washington had secured all the boats for seventy miles up and down the river, he was safe from immediate danger.

Philadelphia in Panic

The approach of the British excited Philadelphia. On the second of December, stores and schools were closed and recruiting parties paraded in the streets with martial music. In a few days, the sick from the army came in large numbers and almost in nakedness. Hospitals and private houses were thus filled and committees went from door to door begging clothing. Handbills describing the insults that New Jersey women were suffering from a licentious soldiery roused the indignation of the people. The old charter was dead, the new constitution had not gone into effect, anarchy was overhanging, and General Putnam was placed in control of the city. On the thirteenth, congress adjourned to meet in Baltimore, of which more a few pages further on. Before leaving, they conferred on Washington "full power to order and direct all things relative to the department, and to the operations of war." The flight of congress "struck a damp on ye spirits of many." The suburban roads were crowded with vehicles of every kind and the river with all sorts of water craft as the terror-stricken inhabitants sought safety in flight.

Handbill Recounting Outrages Committed by British and Hessian Troops

Autograph of Thomas Paine

The Crisis

Among those who made the march from Fort Lee to the Delaware was Thomas Paine. At night and by winter camp-fires he wrote The Crisis which was printed in the Pennsylvania Journal of the nineteenth of December. "These," it said, "are the times that try men's souls: The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of his country; but he that stands it now, deserves the love and thanks of man and woman. . . . The harder the conflict, the more glorious the triumph. . . . Heaven knows how to set a proper price upon its goods; and it would be strange indeed, if so celestial an article as Freedom should not be highly rated." The address was read at the head of each regiment and did much to inspire the soldiers for the work before them.

The American Crisis.

First Page of Thomas Paine's Crisis

As recorded in the preceding volume, Gates had 1776 relieved Sullivan as commander of "the northern army in Canada" with headquarters at Ticonderoga. By reason of its retreat, that army was now within the limits of the northern department, the commander of which was General Schuyler. The two generals were soon in active rivalry and congress declared that "they had no design to invest General Gates with a superior command to General Schuyler, while the troops should be on this side of Canada." After the naval engagement on Lake Champlain and Carleton's return to Canada, all active military operations in that region were suspended. In October, Thaddeus Kosciuszko, a love-lorn Polish patriot, was commissioned as colonel of engineers and sent to the northern army. In November, Gates had seven thousand three hundred and forty-five "effective" rank and file present for duty and on command; Lee had seven thousand eight hundred and twenty-four "effectives" at North Castle; and Heath had four thousand and sixteen at

The Northern Army

Philip Schuyler

October 18

Thaddeus Kosciuszko

Peekskill; while the muster of Washington's army at Newark showed only five thousand four hundred and ten men for duty. 1776

Lee's Disobedience

While Washington was retreating through New Jersey, he had repeatedly sent word to General Lee at North Castle to join him with the men under his command. But Lee was conscious of his popularity and ambitious to obtain the supreme command. The resignation of General Ward had left him the senior major-general of the continental army; if disaster should overtake Washington, it was almost certain that Lee's ambition would be gratified. East of the Hudson he had a practically independent army in an impregnable position; why should he leave it and go to the aid of his rival? He did not cross the Hudson until Washington was at Trenton; even then his advance was slow, for he hoped by an independent movement to cut the British line of communication and thus "to reconquer the Jerseys." To General Gates, who was bringing reinforcements from the northern army, he wrote that "entre nous, a certain great man is most damnably deficient."

December 2

Lee's Capture

White's tavern near Baskingridge, New Jersey, at which Lee wrote this letter, was three miles from his troops. On the thirteenth of December, a party of thirty British dragoons swooped down upon the tavern, seized its most distinguished guest, and hurried him off beyond danger of recapture. The British thought that they had "deprived their opponents of nearly all the military science they possessed." Sullivan promptly marched with the troops thus relieved of Lee and reported to Washington on the twentieth of December. With Sullivan came Gates and reinforcements from the northern army.

From a Chaplain's Diary

The general notion of the conduct of a war includes little more of the functions of an army than killing time in camp; marching and fighting; it largely ignores such prosaic matters as provisions, forage, camp equipage, etc. But every veteran soldier knows that, "like a snake, an army goes upon its belly." In the latter part of 1776,

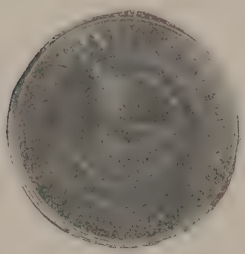

1776 the commissariat of the Revolutionary army must have been at low mark, but we get a glimpse behind the curtain through a few entries in the unprinted diary of the Reverend David Avery, chaplain of Colonel John Patterson's regiment which had come with Gates from Ticonderoga:

> [December] 16. Monday. . . . Came to Bethlehem & put up on ye west side of the Lahi, a river which forms ye west branch of ye Delaware. Genls. Gates and Sterling with Govr. Livingston, are in town ys evening. The genl. hospital for Genl. Washington's army is moved to this place. Genl. Sullivan wh about 3000 men crost ye Delaware last night & ys morning at Eastown.
>
> 20. Friday. . . . Am informed by the Inhabitants yt Genl. Sullivan's men have stole most all the bees in this neighborhood besides many fowls.
>
> 21. Saturday. . . . We now have 500 head of fat cattle in the rear, this side Bethlehem, which have followed Sullivan's division, several of which came from Connecticut.

The British Army in Winter Quarters

After having missed Washington at Trenton, Howe stationed his troops in scattered cantonments for the purpose of holding the territory, protecting the loyalists, and keeping recruits from the American army. It was his intention, in case the Delaware became bridged with ice, to cross over and take Philadelphia; otherwise he would keep his army in winter quarters until spring. Howe returned to New York and Cornwallis "packed his portmanteaus and sent them aboard ship, intending to sail for England as soon as the fumes of the Christmas punch should be duly slept off." This left the British command in New Jersey in the hands of General Grant at Brunswick. Colonel Rall was at Trenton with six field-pieces and fourteen or fifteen hundred men, mostly Hessians. Colonel von Donop, another Hessian officer, was stationed at Bordentown.

Darkness before Dawn

American Coin, 1776

Even with Sullivan's and Gates's divisions in the American camp, Washington saw that at the beginning of the new year he would have only fifteen hundred men in addition to the militia, and upon the latter he knew that he could not rely. "They come," he said, "you cannot tell how, go, you cannot tell when, and act, you cannot tell where, consume your provisions, exhaust your stores, and leave you at last at a critical moment." To congress he wrote "that ten days more will put an end to the existence of this army" and, in justification of some rather peremptory advice concerning the creating of a new army, said: "A character to lose, an estate to forfeit, the inestimable blessing of liberty at stake, and a life devoted, must be my excuse." In a letter to his brother, he unbosomed himself in these words: "If every nerve is not strained to recruit the new army with all possible expedition, I think that the game is pretty near up." 1776 December 20 December 18

As early as the fourteenth of December, Washington had seen that in the scattered disposition of the British forces lay an opportunity. Resolved to stake all on the hazard, he decided to cross the Delaware and attempt to overwhelm both Rall and Donop. The right wing, under Gates, was to attack the cantonments at Mount Holly, Black Horse, and Bordentown; Ewing's division was to cross below Trenton and prevent Rall from escaping or from receiving any assistance from Donop; while Washington, with twenty-four hundred men, was to cross about nine miles above the town and advance upon it from the north. "Necessity, dire necessity," said Washington. A Hazardous Plan

But Gates pretended to be ill and posted off to Baltimore to intrigue with congress. General John Cadwalader, who succeeded him, found the river so full of floating ice that he abandoned the attempt. Ewing likewise failed to effect a crossing, and both felt sure that Washington had been foiled in the same way. But Washington's was the earnestness of desperation. He had gathered boats at McConkey's Ferry, now known as Taylorville, nine miles above Trenton. As his soldiers marched thither, their route "was easily traced, as there was a little snow on the ground, which was tinged here and there with blood from the feet of the men who wore broken shoes." Glover's "old reliables," as handy with the oar as with the musket, again manned the boats. Christmas Cheer

1776 The little force of twenty-four hundred men represented all the states from New Hampshire to Virginia—men hardened by months of fighting and marching in Canada, at Bunker Hill, around New York, and through the Jerseys. It was well that they were no mere "summer soldiers," for the swift running river was filled with great cakes of floating ice, while snow and sleet pinched and benumbed the men with cold and bade fair to spoil the ammunition. For nine weary hours the men toiled and struggled with the ice. Washington had intended to leave the ferry by midnight, but it was after three o'clock in the morning of the twenty-sixth before the last man reached the Jersey shore, and it was about four o'clock by the time the army was ready to march. "This," says Washington, "made me despair of surprising the town, as I well knew we could not reach it before the day was fairly broke; but as I was certain there was no making a retreat without being discovered and harassed on repassing the river, I determined to push on at all events."

Hardship and Heroism

Map of Washington's Advance on Trenton

Confidence, Cards, and Wine

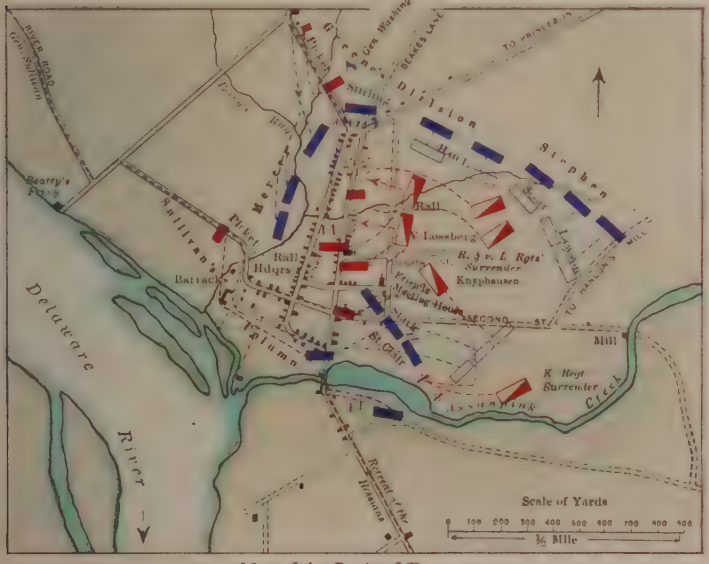

The garrison at Trenton consisted of the regiments of Rall, Knyphausen, and Ansbach, fifty chasseurs, and twenty light dragoons, making a total effective force of a little more than fifteen hundred men. Fortunately, they were so little vigilant that the delay of the Americans was not disastrous. Contrary to Donop's advice, Rall had neglected to erect fortifications. "Let them come!" he had exclaimed in German. "We want no trenches! We'll at them with the bayonet!" He and his men spent the night in drunken revelry; so busy was he with cards and wine that he put into his pocket unread a note that contained a warning of the impending attack. 1776

Autograph of Rall

The road over which the Americans advanced was slippery; at times a storm of sleet beat down upon them; but the wretchedly clad men pressed on to Birmingham. From Birmingham, Sullivan's division moved by the river road, while Greene's, accompanied by Washington, crossed over to the old Scotch road and entered the The Morning March

Map of the Battle of Trenton

Pennington road one mile from Trenton. It is said that when the town was descried in the early morning 1776 light, Washington waved his sword and exclaimed, "There, my brave fellows, are the enemies of your country. Remember what you are to fight for." The men grasped their firelocks tighter and pressed on to meet the enemy. The supreme moment of the American revolution was at hand.

At eight o'clock, Greene's division drove in the picket on the Pennington road. Three minutes later, firing on the river road was heard and Washington knew that Sullivan's men were at work. In spite of the lateness of the hour, the Hessians were completely surprised.

Lieutenant Fischer's Map of the Battle of Trenton

A. Advance of provincial troops from John's Ferry. B. Advance on picket a and Captain von [illegible] regiments after leaving Trenton. F. Attack of Von Lossberg's and Rall's regiments on Trenton. G. Provincial [illegible] Rall's regiments. J. Surrender of Von Lossberg's and Rall's regiments. K. Attack on y by [illegible] L. Attack on H after surrender of Von Lossberg's and Rall's regiments. M. Provincial artillery. N. [illegible]

Under Washington's directions, Colonel Knox placed a battery at the junction of Queen and King (now Warren and Greene) streets, and its fire created havoc as the Hessians tried to form their lines. The pickets that had been driven in had given the alarm, but the commanding colonel was asleep. It is said that the brigade adjutant called at six o'clock and again at seven, but found that Rall was sleeping soundly. When the firing was heard, the adjutant sent an officer who was on duty with thirty or forty men to support the picket post and then loudly summoned Rall; before the latter stepped into King street, the American shot and shell were being fired down the roadway. His own regiment was the regiment "of the day" and half of the command was instantly under arms. Two cannons that had been stationed in front of the guardhouse were ordered to go ahead and the horses were harnessed when Rall cried in German: "My God! the picket is coming in! Push your cannon ahead!" The drivers shouted and the horses plunged forward, but they did not go far. At the bridge over a little stream now called Petty's Run, they were met by the destructive fire of the American artillery at the head of the street. By the time that Rall's brass 3-pounders had been fired six times, eight of the Hessian detachment had been killed or wounded; with the force available, the guns could not be taken off the street. By this time, Stirling's brigade was at the head of King street and a charge was ordered. Captain William Washington and Lieutenant James Monroe of Weedon's regiment led a quick dash; the captain and his lieutenant were wounded, but the 1776 guns were taken. The story of the fight need not be told in further detail. Rall and his half-formed regiments were quickly driven back. Colonel Stark, who had led Sullivan's column, moved directly to the Assanpink bridge and thus cut off further retreat in that direction. While urging his men forward, Rall was mortally wounded and the Hessians soon laid down their arms. Of the mercenaries, twenty-two were killed and more than eighty wounded. The subsequent capture of stragglers raised the number of prisoners to about a thousand. The American loss was two officers and two privates wounded. Among the trophies were six field-pieces, a thousand stands of arms, four flags, and a dozen drums.

Cap worn by a Hessian Soldier Killed at Trenton

The Evening March

Washington did not deem it wise to risk a long delay on New Jersey soil, but, before leaving Trenton, he visited the dying Rall and, in his hour of splendid triumph, offered "those consolations which a soldier and a Christian can bestow." The victorious troops recrossed the Delaware and by midnight were again in their camps. The countermarch was attended with many hardships and great suffering, but with the lately disheartened command were prisoners of war — a new experience for the American army. The victory inspired the people and infused new life into the army. "Good news from the Jerseys!" was the joyous greeting with which patriots saluted each other. On New Year's day, Robert Morris sent to Washington fifty thousand dollars in specie with which to pay wages and bounties to the men. Regiments whose terms were about to expire were induced to remain; the Revolution was saved.

Cornwallis Hastens to Princeton

The alarm and chagrin of the British almost equaled the rejoicing of the Americans. Cornwallis gave up his projected trip to England and hastened to Princeton where he found Donop throwing up intrenchments! Instead of the war being practically over, the British found it difficult to retain possession of New Jersey. In May, 1779, Lord Germain, speaking in his own defense in the house of commons, said: "All our hopes were blasted by that unhappy affair at Trenton."

1776
1777

Washington Reoccupies Trenton December 29–31

Not content with his victory at Trenton, Washington resolved to try to drive the enemy from New Jersey. Transferring his army across the river for the third time in a week, he reoccupied Trenton, issued another appeal to the New Jersey militia, and took up a position on a ridge south of Assanpink Creek where he was joined by General Cadwalader and General Mifflin who had crossed further down the river. His total force amounted to about five thousand men many of whom were almost without discipline.

Miniature portrait of General John Cadwalader (by Peale) owned by Mr George McCall of Philadelphia

Cornwallis Advances to Trenton

Meanwhile, Cornwallis had gathered at Princeton a force of nearly eight thousand men. On the morning of the second of January, he marched with most of his army toward Trenton, but left three regiments at Princeton with orders to follow, and a brigade at Maidenhead, now Lawrenceville. On their way, the British met a detachment of Americans under Brigadier-general Fermoy, a French officer who had been sent out by Washington to harass the enemy and to dispute their advance in every way possible. Fermoy returned to Trenton in a questionable manner, but his men behaved with spirit and much delayed the British advance. Some earthworks had been thrown up and a battery planted at a ravine north of the town and here an additional check was interposed by Greene, but the enemy came on driving the Americans into Trenton and across the bridge. By this time it was growing dark and Cornwallis drew back his weary men, expecting to bag "the old fox" in the morning.

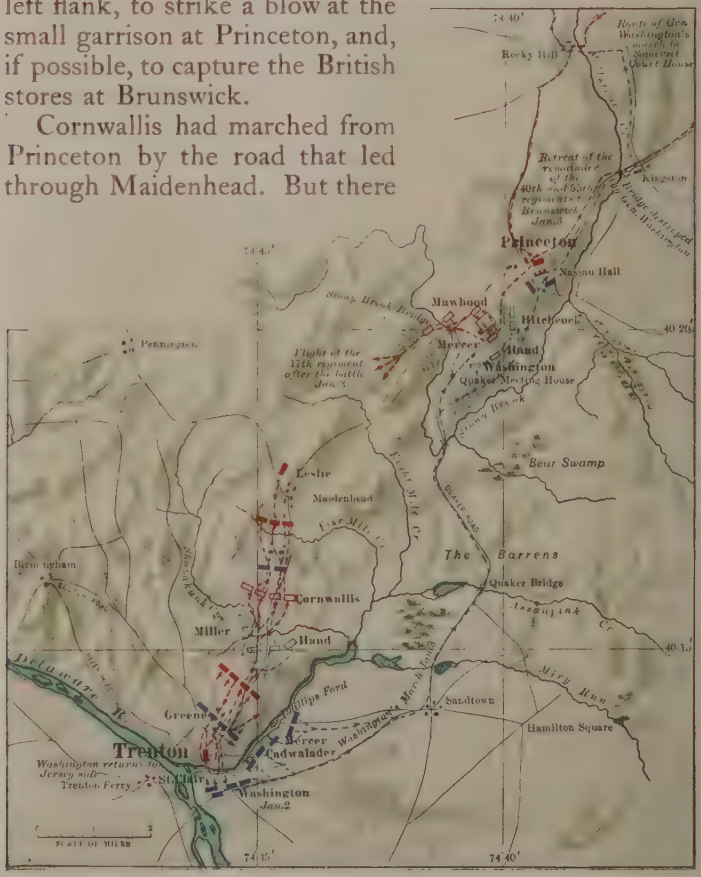

In a Tight Place

As soon as it was dark, Washington called a council to consider the critical situation. The Delaware was filled with floating ice and its passage in the presence of the enemy was out of the question. In another day, Cornwallis would be reinforced by the troops left at Princeton and Maidenhead, and his already superior army would 1777 be so strong that Washington could hardly hope to hold his position. If he should try and fail, his army would be destroyed and the American revolution would be at an end. The council approved a plan to march around the British left flank, to strike a blow at the small garrison at Princeton, and, if possible, to capture the British stores at Brunswick.

Out of the Tight Place

Cornwallis had marched from Princeton by the road that led through Maidenhead. But there was the Quaker road, less used and longer by several miles. The Americans began intrenchments within hearing distance of the enemy and kept the fires burning brightly. About one o'clock, the patriot army, excepting about

Map of Washington's Advance and the Battles of Trenton and Princeton

FADEN'S MAP OF THE OPERATIONS IN NEW JE
(From copy in collection of th y, December 26, 1776, to January 3, 1777 lew York Historical Society)

four hundred men who remained until morning to feed the fires and to continue the intrenching, silently withdrew and took up their quiet march over the rough, newly-frozen Quaker road. About sunrise, they were at the Quaker meeting-house a mile and a half from Princeton. 1 – – –

Washington sent Brigadier-general Mercer with about three hundred and fifty men toward the left to destroy the Stony Brook bridge and thus to delay Cornwallis's expected pursuit and to prevent the escape by that route of the troops in Princeton; with his main force, he moved directly on the village. Two of the three regiments that Cornwallis had left in Princeton had already marched toward Trenton and one of them, the seventeenth, and part of the other, the fifty-fifth, had crossed the bridge. Lieutenant-colonel Mawhood, the acting brigade commander, saw Mercer's troops and, not imagining that the main American army was near, recrossed the bridge. Mercer's men had no bayonets and were unable to stand the charge "for which the British regular has been famous since the days of Marlborough in Europe and Wolfe in America." In trying to rally his men, Mercer was surrounded and, refusing quarter, was repeatedly bayoneted; he died nine days later.

Mercer's Gallantry and Death

Autograph of Hugh Mercer

Hugh Mercer's Sword

Washington heard the firing and hastened to Mercer's support. "You may judge of the surprise of the British," says Knox, "when they saw such a large column marching up. They could not possibly suppose it was our army, for that, they took for granted, was cooped up near Trenton." Regardless of personal danger, Washington rode in among Mercer's routed men and succeeded, in a measure, in rallying them. Hitchcock, Hand, and Cadwalader forced the fighting, and Mawhood retreated, leaving his artillery behind him. After having fought bravely, the regulars took to their heels, threw

The Battle of Princeton

January 3

1777

Uniforms of Officer and Private, Seventeenth Foot (British) (Drawn by P. W. Reynolds, Chelsea, England)

away their guns, and, "scattered down the road, up the creek, and over the fields pursued by the shouting Americans." Most of the remnant of the seventeenth regiment fled toward Maidenhead or across the fields toward Pennington. The fifty-fifth rejoined the fortieth in the town, but, after a short stand near the college buildings, they were soon in full retreat across the Millstone toward Brunswick. Nearly two hundred who were lodged in Nassau Hall were made prisoners; the walls of the building still show marks of the battle. The American loss was about forty killed and wounded; the British loss was one hundred killed and nearly three hundred wounded and prisoners. After following the fleeing regiments to Kingston, Washington turned to the north and, at Somerset Court House, went into camp for the night. He was obliged to give up his plan of capturing the British stores at Brunswick, for his men, "having been without rest, rum, or provisions for two days and nights were unequal to the task of marching seventeen miles further." On the following day, the now victorious army marched to a well-chosen mountain camp near Morristown and there went into winter quarters. It was a long six months since the declaration of American independence. 1777

Nassau Hall

Rum Keg
(Belonged to James Dickerson and Thomas Peabody, of Shirley, Mass.)
Direct reproduction, by courtesy of John E. L. Hazen

Colonel Daniel Hitchcock, a native of Massachusetts and a graduate of Yale, had commanded the eleventh Rhode Island regiment at the siege of Boston, had served under Greene in the fortifying of Long Island, and was with Washington at Harlem Heights. In the stormy day that was crowned with the surprise and defeat of the Hessians at Trenton, he took a violent cold. A few days later, at Princeton, he commanded Nixon's "New England brigade" and, although suffering with the illness that soon resulted in his death, acted with such gallantry that Washington thanked him in the presence of the army and Greene gave him his watch as a testimonial of gratitude and friendship. That watch lies on my desk as I write this paragraph. Hitchcock died of dysentery in camp at Morristown on the thirteenth of January and was buried on the fourteenth with all the honors of war.

Hitchcock's Death

Daniel Hitchcock's Watch
(In possession of the author)

When Leslie, who was in command at Maidenhead, heard the firing in his rear, he at once marched to Princeton and came in sight of the Americans just as they had destroyed the bridge over Stony Brook. An hour after the Americans left Princeton, Cornwallis entered the town "in a most infernal sweat, running, puffing, and blowing, and swearing at being so outwitted." Until he heard the guns at Princeton, he had thought that Washington was in front of him at Trenton. Realizing that his stores were in danger, he made no further attempt to follow Washington and, without ceremony, fell back to Brunswick.

Thus closed one of the most remarkable campaigns in the history of warfare. After a season of unrelieved disaster, the American commander of a discouraged and dissolving army had, in ten days, saved Philadelphia, redeemed all of New Jersey except the posts of Brunswick and Amboy, put a victorious and haughty enemy on the defensive, and dissipated the British dream of speedy conquest. Frederick the Great pronounced the work of that brief period "the most brilliant of any recorded in the annals of military achievements." In 1874, just after the Franco-Prussian war, Von Moltke expressed a similar opinion: "One of the world's very greatest strategists; . . . no finer movement was ever executed; . . . the affair at Princeton was the climax." The tide had turned. Americans were filled with new enthusiasm and recruits once more began to appear. Measured as the crow flies, it is less than thirty miles from Morristown back to Brooklyn Ferry, but measured by the intervening suffering and sorrow or by the transition from gloom to gladness, a mighty ocean lay between. 1776 1777

The Authority of Congress

On the eleventh of June, 1776, in conformity with Richard Henry Lee's resolution, congress had voted that a committee be appointed "to prepare and digest the form of a Confederation to be entered into between these Colonies." On the eleventh of July, this committee reported a draft that was printed and then debated until congress grew weary of considering it. After amendment, it was adopted by the delegates in November, 1777, after which it was submitted to the states for ratification. Maryland was the last of the states to give its approval; her delegates signed the engrossed copy on the first of March, 1781,—the legal date of the articles of confederation. Until that date, congress continued a revolutionary body, but it exercised the political power of the country and was recognized by all the colonies as de jure and de facto the national government.

The New Levies

In the meantime, congress somewhat reluctantly took up the task of raising a new continental army. On the sixteenth of September, 1776, it authorized the organization of eighty-eight battalions of seven hundred and fifty men each. The men were to be enlisted for three years or the war. A bounty of twenty dollars was to be paid each recruit and those who served to the end of the war were to be entitled to one hundred acres of land. The several states were assigned quotas according to ability, Massachusetts and Virginia being called upon for fifteen battalions each, Pennsylvania twelve, Connecticut and

1776 Maryland eight each, New York and New Jersey four 1777 each, Delaware and Georgia one each, etc. "Then congress thought it had created an army."

Congress Seeks Safety at Baltimore

On Wednesday, the eleventh of December, congress by resolution denounced as false a rumor of contemplated flight from Philadelphia and, in view of the distressing condition of the American cause, adopted another resolution calling for a day of fasting and humiliation. But such parliamentary action could not stop the advance of the British December 13 troops across New Jersey, and, two days later, congress adjourned to meet again at Baltimore as already described. A week later, the delegates assembled in the Maryland metropolis and resumed their sessions in a room in Fite's three-story brick tavern, later known as Congress Hall.

Washington is Made "Dictator"

At the end of another week, and before the surprise of the Hessians at Trenton was known at Baltimore, congress, in "perfect reliance on the wisdom, vigour, and December 27 uprightness of general Washington," vested him "with full, ample, and complete powers to raise and collect together, in the most speedy and effectual manner, from any or all of these United States, sixteen battalions of infantry in addition to those voted by Congress; to appoint officers for the said battalions of infantry;" and, in addition, three thousand light horse, three regiments of artillery, and a corps of engineers, and to establish their pay; "to appoint all officers under the rank of brigadier-general; . . . to take, wherever he may be, whatever he may want for the use of the army, if the inhabitants will not sell it, allowing a reasonable price for the same; to arrest and confine persons who refuse to take the Continental Currency or are otherwise disaffected to the American cause;" and that "the foregoing powers be vested in general Washington, for and during the term of six months from the date hereof, unless sooner determined by Congress." On Thursday, the twenty-seventh of February, Washington's successes at Trenton and Princeton having made Philadelphia safe, congress adjourned "to 10 o'clock on Wednesday next to meet at the State House in Philadelphia."

British Caricature on the Flight of Con

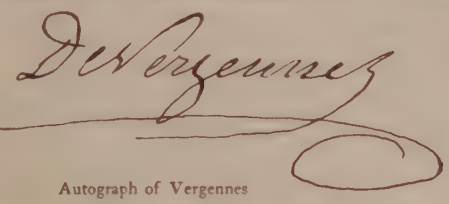

(From copy in the

ESS FROM PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 13, 1776
ston Public Library)

In the spring of 1776, Silas Deane of Connecticut was sent to France as the secret political and financial agent of congress. After Vergennes, the wily minister of foreign affairs, heard of the declaration of independence, he accorded Deane an interview—the beginning of fruitful diplomatic relations between France and the United States. Before the end of the year, Deane had secured for the American armies thirty thousand stand of arms, thirty thousand suits of clothes, more than two hundred and fifty cannons, and other military stores. In September, congress chose Benjamin Franklin and the somewhat querulous Arthur Lee to act with Deane as commissioners for the negotiation of treaties with foreign powers. The story of foreign aid to the rebellious colonists of the traditional enemy of France will be told more fully in a later chapter.

1776 Seeking Foreign Aid

Autograph of Vergennes

In conformity with the suggestions of the New York provincial congress, congress had voted to issue two million dollars in continental bills of credit. A month later, another million was authorized and the liability for the three millions was distributed among the colonies; the bills were to be redeemed in four annual installments beginning at the end of four years. In November, an additional three millions were authorized, to be redeemed in four annual installments beginning at the end of eight years. In February, 1776, came an order for four millions more, of which one million was to be in bills of less than a dollar each—the prototype of the "fractional currency" of the civil war. In April, a standing committee and an auditor-general were appointed—the protoplasm of our present treasury department. In May, came an issue of five millions, and in August, an issue of five millions more. With twenty million dollars of continental money on the market, the value of the bills had been remarkably well maintained. But the individual states were also freely printing paper money. In the general gloom that came with the loss of New York and the continued ill-success of the American arms, the value of the continental money rapidly fell, and, as we have seen, Washington was authorized to arrest and confine those who refused to take the bills. While at Baltimore, congress approved a New England convention scheme for regulating prices and, while its bills were passing at

Continental Finance

July 22, 1775

January 14 half their face value, resolved that the continental currency "ought to pass current in all payments, trade, and dealings, and be deemed equal in value to the same nominal sums in Spanish dollars," and that they who refused so to accept them ought to be considered "enemies of the United States" and visited by the local authorities with "forfeitures and penalties." But prices would not be regulated by legislation, and congress was February 27 forced to renew the issue of bills of credit. The financing of the Revolution will be considered further in the fifteenth chapter of this volume.

CHAPTER III

BRANDYWINE AND GERMANTOWN

FROM his New York prison, Ethan Allen wrote to the Connecticut assembly that he "had suffered everything short of death." The treatment of General Lee was perhaps less rigorous, but his case was more complicated, for the British held that he was a deserter. Late in December, 1776, Washington sent a flag of truce to inquire about Lee's treatment; a little later, he gave warning that any violence committed upon Lee's "life or liberty, will be severely retaliated upon the lives or liberties of the British officers, or those of their foreign allies, at present in our hands." On the twentieth of December, Sir William Howe had reported to Lord Germain some of the difficulties of the case and, in September, his majesty consented that Lee, "though deserving the most exemplary punishment" as a deserter, might be considered as a prisoner of war subject to exchange.

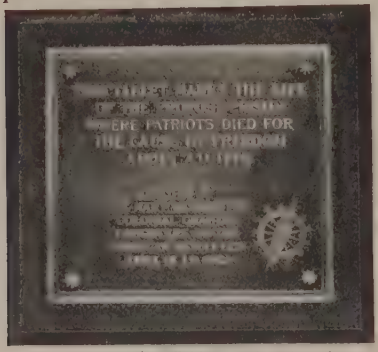

Lee in Captivity

January 13, 1777

Meantime, Lee had submitted to the Howes a scheme for the subjugation of the rebels. Carleton's army was to keep the New Englanders east of the Hudson, fourteen thousand British were to clear the Jerseys and seize Philadelphia, while four thousand more were to go by sea and occupy Alexandria and Annapolis; promise of pardon was to follow. "I am so confident of the event that I will venture to assert with the penalty of my life if the plan is fully adopted, and no accidents (such as a rupture betwixt the Powers of Europe) intervene that in less than two months from the date of the proclamation not a spark of this desolating war remains unextinguished in any part of the Continent." This treachery on Lee's part was not disclosed until eighty years later when the document, indorsed "Mr. Lee's Plan, 29th March, 1777," was found among the papers left by Sir Henry Strachey, secretary to the Howes. Whether Howe's plans for the coming campaign were in any way influenced by Lee's scheme will probably remain a matter of conjecture.

Lee's Treasonable Plan

Commemorative Tablet on the Site of the Provost Prison

British Prison Pens

Many of the patriot prisoners were less fortunate than Lee. In New York, where most of them were held, the soldiers were crowded into churches and sugar-

Map of Prison Ship Stations in Wallabout Bay houses, ill fed, ill clothed, without fires, and at the mercy of a provost-marshal who enriched himself by "feeding the dead and starving the living." Sickness soon became general and "many lay for six, seven, or eight days in all the filth of nature and of the dysentery, till death, more kind than the Britons, put an end to their misery." The mortality was frightful, while many of those who secured release fell on the way to their homes or died soon after their arrival. With perhaps some exaggeration, it was declared that General Howe had "discharged all the privates who were prisoners in New York: one half he has sent to the World of Spirits for want of food; the other he hath sent to warn their countrymen of the danger of falling into his hands, and to convince them, by ocular demonstration, that it is infinitely better to be slain in battle than to be taken prisoner by British brutes."

1777 January

Bad as were the prison pens, the prison ships were worse. The most infamous of these was the "Jersey," an old dismantled "sixty-four" with port-holes closed and two rows of iron-barred breathing holes in her sides. The "Jersey" was a type of all the prison ships and she was called "The Hell." Stationed at first off the Battery, she was soon removed to the more secluded anchorage of Wallabout Bay. Among the other ships were the "Hunter" and the "Whitby" (a hospital ship); the "Scorpion" and the "Stromboli" (significant names); and the "Good Hope" (cruel irony). Most of these prisoners were privateers and, as the American "navy" generally paroled its prisoners instead of bringing them into port for exchange, the confinement of those held in

British Prison Ships

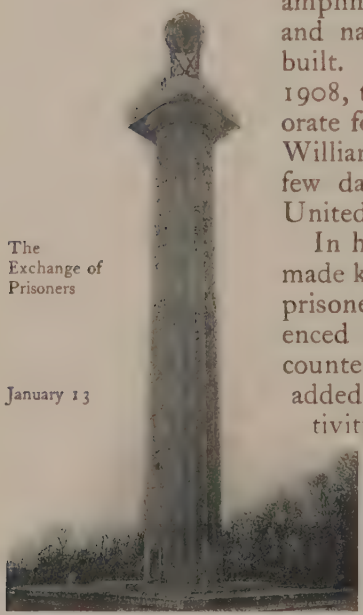

British Prison Ship "Jersey"

1777 the floating dungeons was worse than that of the inmates of the church and sugar-house prisons in duration of captivity as well as in intensity of suffering. "The highest privilege to which any prisoner could aspire was to go ashore with a burying party."

> Each day at least six carcasses we bore,
> And scratched their graves along the sandy shore.

There are no records that tell the number of those who perished in these hulks, but it is estimated that more than ten thousand died in the "Jersey" alone. Most of the dead were buried without ceremony. In 1808, their remains were placed in a temporary vault over which was laid a still preserved marble slab. In 1873, the remains were removed to an unmarked tomb in Fort Green Park. A quarter of a century later, the work of building a monument was renewed; individual generosity was amplified by contributions from city, state, and nation, and thus the monument was built. On the fourteenth of November, 1908, the memorial was dedicated with elaborate formalities that included an oration by William H. Taft who had been elected, a few days before, to the presidency of the United States.

Prison Ship Martyrs' Monument

The Exchange of Prisoners

January 13

In his letter concerning Lee, Washington made known to General Howe that released prisoners had reported the barbarities experienced and that "their miserable, emaciated countenances confirm" their stories. He added: "If you are determined to make captivity as distressing as possible to those whose lot it is to fall into it, let me know it, that we may be upon equal terms, for your conduct must and shall mark mine." Finally a cartel for a general exchange of prisoners was agreed upon, but the men given up by Howe were so broken down by their captivity that Washington refused to consider them exchanged and would not return for them an equal number of able-bodied British soldiers.

1777

Glass Houses

It is only fair to suggest that the British had looked upon their prisoners as criminals rather than as captives. "The stigma of rebels," says Irving, "seemed to take from them all the indulgences, scanty and miserable as they are, usually granted to prisoners of war." It seemed as if the very ties of consanguinity rendered the hostility of the British soldiery more intolerant, for it was observed that American prisoners were better treated by the Hessians than by the British. On the other hand, the Americans were guilty of many cruelties. Tories were tarred and feathered and ridden on rails; some were murdered and the property of others was confiscated; the British prison ships were scarcely less humane than was the mine at Simsbury in Connecticut in which Tories were confined.

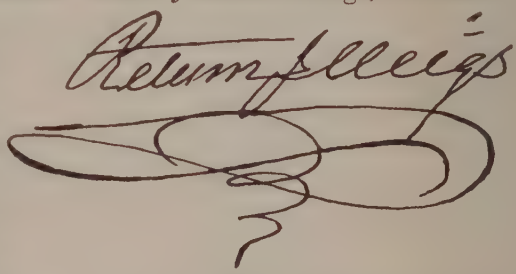

Map Showing Location of British and American Prisons of War during the Revolution

The campaign of 1777 opened with some inter-

1777 Tit for Tat

esting minor movements. On the twenty-third of March, a British force captured and destroyed an American depot of supplies at Peekskill on the Hudson and, late in May, Colonel Return Jonathan Meigs, with about one hundred and seventy men, crossed from Guilford, Connecticut, to Sag Harbor on Long Island and, without losing a man, burned a large quantity of British stores and twelve brigs and sloops, one of which carried twelve guns.

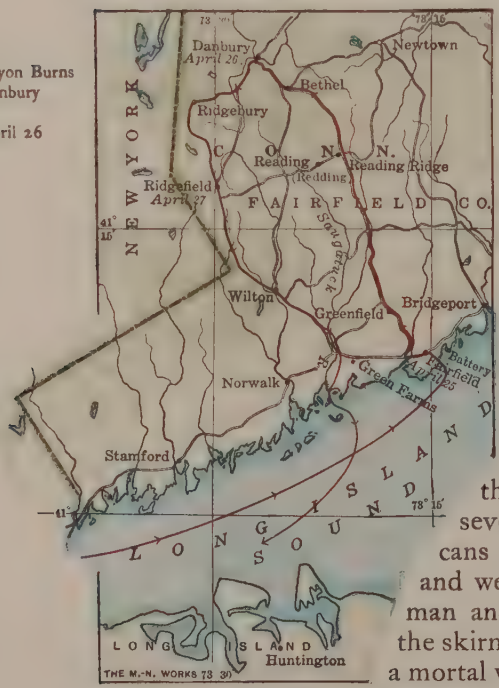

Autograph of Meigs

Tryon Burns Danbury

April 26

In April, William Tryon, royal governor and British major-general, landed near Fairfield, Connecticut, and marched thence to Danbury where he burned part of the town and destroyed more than sixteen hundred tents and other stores—a serious loss to the ill-supplied Americans. On the retreat, the British were severely harassed by Americans who had risen in arms and were led by generals Silliman and Wooster. In one of the skirmishes, Wooster received a mortal wound. General Arnold who happened to be in the neighborhood on a visit, soon arrived with several hundred militia and a desperate fight followed. Arnold had two horses shot under him. When the first horse fell and the rider was extricating his feet from the stirrups, a Tory called upon him to "Surrender!" "Not yet," answered Arnold, as, freeing himself, he drew a pistol, shot the Tory, and escaped through whizzing bullets to the woods. The British made their way to their convoy with a loss of about forty killed, many wounded, and some captured. Trevelyan, an English historian, says: "It was Lexington over again, in every particular, except that at Lexington the Royal forces had been commanded by a man of honour." 1777

Map of Tryon's Raid of 1777

The Imperfect Righting of a Great Wrong February 19

While at Baltimore, congress had appointed five new major-generals, Stirling, Mifflin, Saint Clair, Stephen, and Lincoln, passing over Arnold who was senior brigadier. The pretext for this strange proceeding was that Connecticut already had two major-generals and ought not to have another, but the real reason lay deeper. Horatio Gates's intrigue was aided by New England hostility to Schuyler. As Schuyler's conspicuous friend, Arnold was disliked by Schuyler's enemies, and by others he was blamed for the disasters of the northern campaign. Arnold was incensed by the injustice of congress, but, soothed by Washington, he consented to remain in the army and to serve under those who lately were his inferiors. After the Tryon raid, congress gave him a fine horse and a major-general's commission, but did not restore him to his relative rank.

The First Flag

The First Flag of the Union (a reconstruction)

At the beginning of 1776, the union flag of thirteen stripes, alternate red and white, with the crosses of Saint George and Saint Andrew had been unfurled in the camp

1777 of Washington's army around Boston. The joined crosses indicated that, although the American colonies had united for defense against England's tyranny, they still acknowledged her sovereignty. After the declaration of independence, the British "union" was removed from the colors of the new nation. On the fourteenth of June, 1777, congress adopted the following:

> Resolved, That the flag of the thirteen United States be thirteen stripes, alternate red and white: that the union be thirteen stars, white in a blue field, representing a new constellation.

Each year, the people of the United States celebrate the fourteenth of June as "Flag Day."

Plans for the Campaign

From the first week in January to the last week in May, there was no military movement of general importance. Washington and his army were at Morristown. Many of the men went to their homes and others came to take their places. But the new army materialized with difficulty and delay; in March, Washington had not more than four thousand men upon his muster-rolls and the enemy was preparing to wage the next campaign on the grand scale, following the plan of 1776. Burgoyne was to advance up Lake Champlain, take Ticonderoga, and then seize Albany. Saint Leger, with a smaller force, was to advance by way of Oswego and the Mohawk and effect a junction with Burgoyne. General Howe, meanwhile, was to force his way up the Hudson and meet the other two at Albany, thus cutting off New England from the other colonies.

Howe's Pigeonholed Instructions

The plan was an attractive one, but it called for close coöperation and, as the event proved, that was lacking. There is a somewhat doubtful story to the effect that Burgoyne and Saint Leger received definite orders, while

June 5

Howe received a copy of the plan but no instructions for himself. It is said that when the letter for Howe was brought to Lord Germain for signature, it was found that it had not been "fair copied." Germain was on the point of leaving London and, unwilling to lose his holiday, hurried off, intending to sign the letter on his return; when he came back, the matter had slipped his mind.

On the twenty-eighth of May, Washington broke camp at Morristown and took position at Middlebrook on the Raritan, about ten miles from Brunswick. As though left free by Germain's slip of memory, Howe maneuvered for three weeks in the hope of bringing on a general engagement; foiled by Washington's masterly strategy, he then withdrew his army to Staten Island and prepared to make an attempt on Philadelphia by sea. Early in July, he began to embark his forces and, after hearing of the capture of Ticonderoga, sailed from Sandy Hook with more than two hundred and fifty vessels and about eighteen thousand troops. General Clinton was left with six or seven thousand men in New York. On the thirtieth, the fleet arrived off the Delaware; then for more than three weeks it disappeared from view.

1777 Howe at Sea

July 23

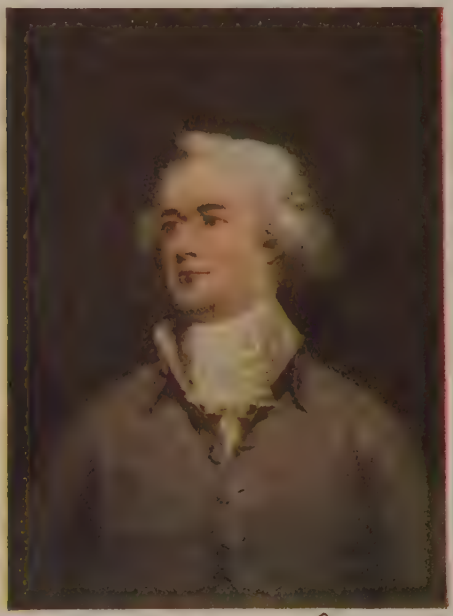

The departure of Howe's army and the British fleet left the Americans in deep suspense. Believing that Howe would go up the Hudson, Washington had transferred his army to Ramapo, New York, to be ready to oppose him. When he became satisfied that the fleet had left Sandy Hook, he set out for the Delaware, but held himself ready to countermarch. "Genl Howe's in a manner abandoning General Burgoyne is so unaccountable a matter that, till I am fully assured it is so, I cannot help casting my Eyes continually behind me," he wrote to Gates. On the same day, Burgoyne wrote to Lord Germain: "I have spared no pains to open a correspondence with Sir William Howe . . . and am in total ignorance of the situation or intentions of that general." The next day, upon receiving news of the appearance of the fleet off the capes of the Delaware, Washington advanced to Germantown, but, when the fleet again disappeared, he led the main army into camp on the Neshaming Creek, about twenty miles north of Philadelphia. So puzzled were the Americans that, on the twenty-first of August, a council of war rendered the unanimous opinion that Howe had probably sailed for Charleston and that the army should immediately return to the Hudson in order that Burgoyne could be opposed

Washington and Burgoyne at Sea

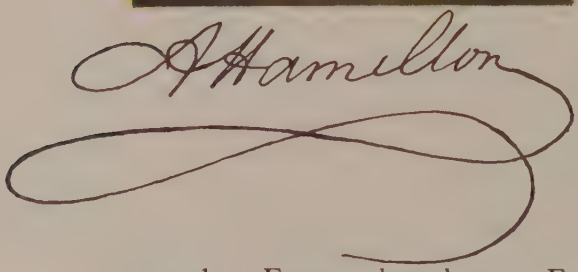

July 24

July 30

1777 or New York attacked. Washington at once sent one of his aides, Colonel Alexander Hamilton, to report the conclusion of the council to congress and to seek its decision on the matter. Congress promptly approved the decision, but, on the following day, word was received that immediately changed the plan of operations.

Pulaski

Leaving the British fleet at sea, we turn our attention for a moment to three European officers who, in the summer of 1777, entered the service of the young republic. Count Casimir Pulaski was a native of Poland whose estates had been confiscated; outlawed and with a price upon his head, he escaped to Turkey and thence passed to France where he met Franklin. As a result of this meeting, Pulaski came to America, became a member of Washington's staff, and, on the fifteenth of September, was appointed commander of the cavalry with the rank of major-general. As the native officers would not be reconciled to the orders of a foreigner who could speak little English and whose ideas of discipline and tactics differed widely from their own, Pulaski resigned his command in March, 1778. By authority of congress, he then recruited, chiefly at Baltimore, three companies of cavalry armed with lances and three companies of light infantry—a corps that became famous under the name of Pulaski's legion.

The Baron de Kalb

Another officer was the "Baron" Johann de Kalb, a native of Bayreuth who had risen to the rank of brigadier general in the French army. He had taken part in the Seven Years' war and, in 1768, was sent to America as the secret agent of the French government. In 1777, he agreed with Deane to join the continental army, came to America with Lafayette, and was made a major-general. Both Pulaski and Kalb were to give their lives to the cause in which they now embarked.

Kalb

September 15

The third officer was the Marquis de Lafayette, not yet twenty years of age, the possessor of a large fortune, the husband of a charming wife, and one of a family that for centuries had been distinguished in French history. In August, 1775, while stationed at Metz as a captain of artillery, he heard the duke of Gloucester, brother of the English king, give an account of the American revolt. Before he left the table, he resolved to offer his services to America. At Paris, he found grave and unexpected difficulties; France was not ready to take action that might result

Lafayette

BANNER OF THE PULASKI LEGION
(Preserved in the collection of the Maryland Historical Society) in war with England. But Lafayette persevered and was introduced by Kalb to Deane who promised him a major-general's commission. 1777

Pulaski

An Earnest French Ally

Secretly and at his own expense, Lafayette fitted out a ship at Bordeaux. In safe disobedience of orders from the court, he put to sea with Kalb and twelve other French officers. They landed in South Carolina in June and, a month later, were at Philadelphia. European "counts" were coming to America then somewhat as they do today, and congress was so beset by them that Lafayette and his companions met with a cool reception. But the marquis explained that he wished to serve as a volunteer and at his own expense and congress appointed him a major-general. The eager youth reported at army headquarters on the Neshaming and was received into the military family of the commander-in-chief. The friendship thus begun was ended only by death. Some of the other officers were disappointed and returned to France.

April 20

July 31

Two days after Lafayette's arrival in the American camp came the news of the appearance of the British fleet in Chesapeake Bay. At Philadelphia there was a strange mixture of consternation and lukewarmness and Washington marched his army through the streets with the hope that the display might "have some influence on the minds of the disaffected there." From the continental capital, the army advanced without delay to Wilmington. About this time came cheering news from Stark at Bennington, of which more in a later chapter.

Howe's Fleet Reappears

August 24

Howe's Advance toward the Brandywine

On the day that Washington arrived at Wilmington, the British, eighteen thousand strong, landed a few miles below the head of Elk [Elkton]. On the third of September, they drove back Maxwell's picked corps. It has been claimed that, while passing through Philadelphia, some of the Delaware troops had secured flags made in accordance with the statute of the fourteenth of June and that, in this skirmish near Coochs bridge, the stars and stripes were first under fire. Of this there is no definite proof, only a presumption. It is possible, perhaps probable, that the new flag was displayed then and there, but it is known (and knowledge is more conclusive than presumption) that the stars and stripes had been used in action a month before at Fort Schuyler, as will be explained more fully in the next chapter. In seeking to discredit the Fort Schuyler claim, some Delaware historians have asserted that the flag there used was "merely an improvised one, in no sense complete and regular." It certainly was improvised, but I know of no reason for imagining that it was irregular or incomplete. After the affair of the third of September, the Americans took up a position back of Red Clay Creek, but, early in the morning of the ninth, fearing that the enemy meant to march around his right wing, Washington fell back to a new position behind the Brandywine. The British followed leisurely and prepared to give battle. 1777

August 3

Uniform of Colonel Moylan's Fourth Regiment of Light Dragoons (American)
(From original drawing by Harry A. Ogden)

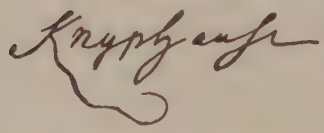

The American Position

The Brandywine is formed by the union of two smaller creeks known respectively as the East and West branches. Though its banks were then steep and bordered by forests, it was fordable at several places. The center of the American army lay at Chads Ford on the main road to Philadelphia; it consisted of Weedon's, Muhlenberg's, and Wayne's brigades and Maxwell's light infantry, all under command of Major-general Greene. The left wing, consisting of the Pennsylvania militia under General Armstrong, extended to Pyles Ford below — naturally the strongest part of the line. The right wing consisted of Stirling's, Stephen's, and Sullivan's divisions with Sullivan in command. The total effective force amounted to about eleven thousand men; the position that they held was not especially strong.

Howe's Plan

The British army was at Kennett Square and stronger by several thousand. Believing that an attack in front 1777 would be hazardous, Howe resolved to try his favorite plan, the one that had worked so well on Long Island.

Autograph of Knyphausen

With a force variously estimated at from five to seven thousand, Knyphausen was to advance by the direct road to Chads Ford and occupy the attention of the rebels while a stronger column, commanded by Cornwallis and accompanied by Howe, was to make a long detour to the left, cross the branches of the Brandywine, and fall upon the rear of the American right wing.

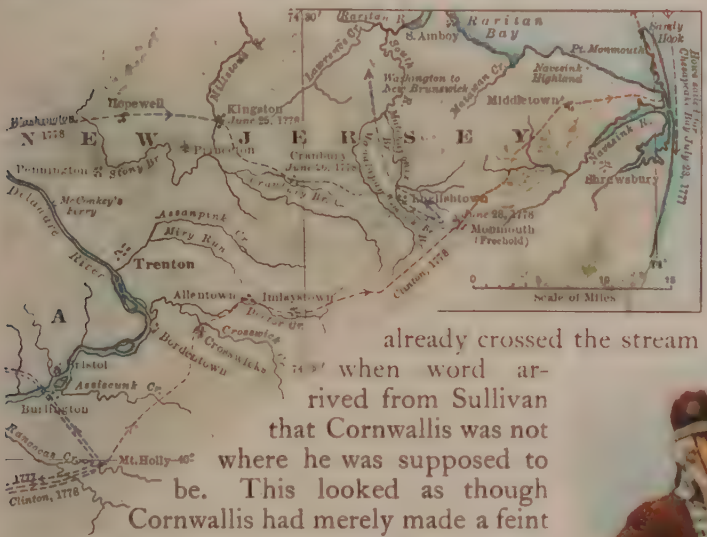

Uncertain and Contradictory Information

The flanking column set out from

Pennebecker Mill
Camp Oct. 8-15 Kulpaville
Camp Oct. 16-21 Worcester
Camp Oct. 21-Nov. 2
Camp Nov. 2-
Warwick
Yellow Springs (Chester Springs)
Valley Forge
Gordon's Ford
Pawling's Ford
Warren Tavern
White Horse
Downingtown
Turk's Head Tavern (West Chester)
Dilworth
Chads Ford
Kennett Square
Hockessin
Newport
Christina
New Castle
Elkton
Gray's Hill
Knyphausen
Philadelphia
Cornwallis enters Sept. 27
Crooked Billet (Hatboro)
Chestnut Hill
Germantown
Oct. 4, 1777
Howe
Gen. Greene
Cornwallis
Grant's Cornwallis
Wilmington
Delaware River
Raccoon Cr.
Salem Cr.
Iron Hill
Couch's Bridge
Head of Elk Falls
Newtown
Camp Dec. 8-19
Camp Dec. 19-May 6, 1778
Camp May 6, 1778
Valley Forge
Jeffries Ford
Trimble's Ford
Sept. 11, 1777
Sept. 10
Sept. 25, 1777
Sept. 26
Sept. 27
Sept. 28
Sept. 29
Sept. 30
Oct. 1
Oct. 2
Oct. 3
Oct. 4
Oct. 5
Oct. 6
Oct. 7
Oct. 8
Oct. 9
Oct. 10
Oct. 11
Oct. 12
Oct. 13
Oct. 14
Oct. 15
Oct. 16
Oct. 17
Oct. 18, 1778
Nov. 16, 1777
Nov. 20, 1777
Nov. 22, 1777
Nov. 30, 1777
Dec. 5
Dec. 7
Dec. 8
Dec. 11
Dec. 14
Dec. 19
Dec. 22
Dec. 25
Dec. 26
Dec. 27
Dec. 28
Dec. 29
Dec. 30
Dec. 31
Jan. 1, 1778
Jan. 2
Jan. 3
Jan. 4
Jan. 5
Jan. 6
Jan. 7
Jan. 8
Jan. 9
Jan. 10
Jan. 11
Jan. 12
Jan. 13
Jan. 14
Jan. 15
Jan. 16
Jan. 17
Jan. 18
Jan. 19
Jan. 20
Jan. 21
Jan. 22
Jan. 23
Jan. 24
Jan. 25
Jan. 26
Jan. 27
Jan. 28
Jan. 29
Jan. 30
Jan. 31
Feb. 1
Feb. 2
Feb. 3
Feb. 4
Feb. 5
Feb. 6
Feb. 7
Feb. 8
Feb. 9
Feb. 10
Feb. 11
Feb. 12
Feb. 13
Feb. 14
Feb. 15
Feb. 16
Feb. 17
Feb. 18
Feb. 19
Feb. 20
Feb. 21
Feb. 22
Feb. 23
Feb. 24
Feb. 25
Feb. 26
Feb. 27
Feb. 28
Mar. 1
Mar. 2
Mar. 3
Mar. 4
Mar. 5
Mar. 6
Mar. 7
Mar. 8
Mar. 9
Mar. 10
Mar. 11
Mar. 12
Mar. 13
Mar. 14
Mar. 15
Mar. 16
Mar. 17
Mar. 18
Mar. 19
Mar. 20
Mar. 21
Mar. 22
Mar. 23
Mar. 24
Mar. 25
Mar. 26
Mar. 27
Mar. 28
Mar. 29
Mar. 30
Mar. 31
Apr. 1
Apr. 2
Apr. 3
Apr. 4
Apr. 5
Apr. 6
Apr. 7
Apr. 8
Apr. 9
Apr. 10
Apr. 11
Apr. 12
Apr. 13
Apr. 14
Apr. 15
Apr. 16
Apr. 17
Apr. 18
Apr. 19
Apr. 20
Apr. 21
Apr. 22
Apr. 23
Apr. 24
Apr. 25
Apr. 26
Apr. 27
Apr. 28
Apr. 29
Apr. 30
May 1
May 2
May 3
May 4
May 5
May 6
May 7
May 8
May 9
May 10
May 11
May 12
May 13
May 14
May 15
May 16
May 17
May 18
May 19
May 20
May 21
May 22
May 23
May 24
May 25
May 26
May 27
May 28
May 29
May 30
May 31
June 1
June 2
June 3
June 4
June 5
June 6
June 7
June 8
June 9
June 10
June 11
June 12
June 13
June 14
June 15
June 16
June 17
June 18
June 19
June 20
June 21
June 22
June 23
June 24
June 25
June 26
June 27
June 28
June 29
June 30
July 1
July 2
July 3
July 4
July 5
July 6
July 7
July 8
July 9
July 10
July 11
July 12
July 13
July 14
July 15
July 16
July 17
July 18
July 19
July 20
July 21
July 22
July 23
July 24
July 25
July 26
July 27
July 28
July 29
July 30
July 31
Aug. 1
Aug. 2
Aug. 3
Aug. 4
Aug. 5
Aug. 6
Aug. 7
Aug. 8
Aug. 9
Aug. 10
Aug. 11
Aug. 12
Aug. 13
Aug. 14
Aug. 15
Aug. 16
Aug. 17
Aug. 18
Aug. 19
Aug. 20
Aug. 21
Aug. 22
Aug. 23
Aug. 24
Aug. 25
Aug. 26
Aug. 27
Aug. 28
Aug. 29
Aug. 30
Aug. 31
Sept. 1
Sept. 2
Sept. 3
Sept. 4
Sept. 5
Sept. 6
Sept. 7
Sept. 8
Sept. 9
Sept. 10
Sept. 11
Sept. 12
Sept. 13
Sept. 14
Sept. 15
Sept. 16
Sept. 17
Sept. 18
Sept. 19
Sept. 20
Sept. 21
Sept. 22
Sept. 23
Sept. 24
Sept. 25
Sept. 26
Sept. 27
Sept. 28
Sept. 29
Sept. 30
Oct. 1
Oct. 2
Oct. 3
Oct. 4
Oct. 5
Oct. 6
Oct. 7
Oct. 8
Oct. 9
Oct. 10
Oct. 11
Oct. 12
Oct. 13
Oct. 14
Oct. 15
Oct. 16
Oct. 17
Oct. 18
Oct. 19
Oct. 20
Oct. 21
Oct. 22
Oct. 23
Oct. 24
Oct. 25
Oct. 26
Oct. 27
Oct. 28
Oct. 29
Oct. 30
Oct. 31
Nov. 1
Nov. 2
Nov. 3
Nov. 4
Nov. 5
Nov. 6
Nov. 7
Nov. 8
Nov. 9
Nov. 10
Nov. 11
Nov. 12
Nov. 13
Nov. 14
Nov. 15
Nov. 16
Nov. 17
Nov. 18
Nov. 19
Nov. 20
Nov. 21
Nov. 22
Nov. 23
Nov. 24
Nov. 25
Nov. 26
Nov. 27
Nov. 28
Nov. 29
Nov. 30
Dec. 1
Dec. 2
Dec. 3
Dec. 4
Dec. 5
Dec. 6
Dec. 7
Dec. 8
Dec. 9
Dec. 10
Dec. 11
Dec. 12
Dec. 13
Dec. 14
Dec. 15
Dec. 16
Dec. 17
Dec. 18
Dec. 19
Dec. 20
Dec. 21
Dec. 22
Dec. 23
Dec. 24
Dec. 25
Dec. 26
Dec. 27
Dec. 28
Dec. 29
Dec. 30
Dec. 31
Jan. 1, 1779
Jan. 2
Jan. 3
Jan. 4
Jan. 5
Jan. 6
Jan. 7
Jan. 8
Jan. 9
Jan. 10
Jan. 11
Jan. 12
Jan. 13
Jan. 14
Jan. 15
Jan. 16
Jan. 17
Jan. 18
Jan. 19
Jan. 20
Jan. 21
Jan. 22
Jan. 23
Jan. 24
Jan. 25
Jan. 26
Jan. 27
Jan. 28
Jan. 29
Jan. 30
Jan. 31
Feb. 1
Feb. 2
Feb. 3
Feb. 4
Feb. 5
Feb. 6
Feb. 7
Feb. 8
Feb. 9
Feb. 10
Feb. 11
Feb. 12
Feb. 13
Feb. 14
Feb. 15
Feb. 16
Feb. 17
Feb. 18
Feb. 19
Feb. 20
Feb. 21
Feb. 22
Feb. 23
Feb. 24
Feb. 25
Feb. 26
Feb. 27
Feb. 28
Mar. 1
Mar. 2
Mar. 3
Mar. 4
Mar. 5
Mar. 6
Mar. 7
Mar. 8
Mar. 9
Mar. 10
Mar. 11
Mar. 12
Mar. 13
Mar. 14
Mar. 15
Mar. 16
Mar. 17
Mar. 18
Mar. 19
Mar. 20
Mar. 21
Mar. 22
Mar. 23
Mar. 24
Mar. 25
Mar. 26
Mar. 27
Mar. 28
Mar. 29
Mar. 30
Mar. 31
Apr. 1
Apr. 2
Apr. 3
Apr. 4
Apr. 5
Apr. 6
Apr. 7
Apr. 8
Apr. 9
Apr. 10
Apr. 11
Apr. 12
Apr. 13
Apr. 14
Apr. 15
Apr. 16
Apr. 17
Apr. 18
Apr. 19
Apr. 20
Apr. 21
Apr. 22
Apr. 23
Apr. 24
Apr. 25
Apr. 26
Apr. 27
Apr. 28
Apr. 29
Apr. 30
May 1
May 2
May 3
May 4
May 5
May 6
May 7
May 8
May 9
May 10
May 11
May 12
May 13
May 14
May 15
May 16
May 17
May 18
May 19
May 20
May 21
May 22
May 23
May 24
May 25
May 26
May 27
May 28
May 29
May 30
May 31
June 1
June 2
June 3
June 4
June 5
June 6
June 7
June 8
June 9
June 10
June 11
June 12
June 13
June 14
June 15
June 16
June 17
June 18
June 19
June 20
June 21
June 22
June 23
June 24
June 25
June 26
June 27
June 28
June 29
June 30
July 1
July 2
July 3
July 4
July 5
July 6
July 7
July 8
July 9
July 10
July 11
July 12
July 13
July 14
July 15
July 16
July 17
July 18
July 19
July 20
July 21
July 22
July 23
July 24
July 25
July 26
July 27
July 28
July 29
July 30
July 31
Aug. 1
Aug. 2
Aug. 3
Aug. 4
Aug. 5
Aug. 6
Aug. 7
Aug. 8
Aug. 9
Aug. 10
Aug. 11
Aug. 12
Aug. 13
Aug. 14
Aug. 15
Aug. 16
Aug. 17
Aug. 18
Aug. 19
Aug. 20
Aug. 21
Aug. 22
Aug. 23
Aug. 24
Aug. 25
Aug. 26
Aug. 27
Aug. 28
Aug. 29
Aug. 30
Aug. 31
Sept. 1
Sept. 2
Sept. 3
Sept. 4
Sept. 5
Sept. 6
Sept. 7
Sept. 8
Sept. 9
Sept. 10
Sept. 11
Sept. 12
Sept. 13
Sept. 14
Sept. 15
Sept. 16
Sept. 17
Sept. 18
Sept. 19
Sept. 20
Sept. 21
Sept. 22
Sept. 23
Sept. 24
Sept. 25
Sept. 26
Sept. 27
Sept. 28
Sept. 29
Sept. 30
Oct. 1
Oct. 2
Oct. 3
Oct. 4
Oct. 5
Oct. 6
Oct. 7
Oct. 8
Oct. 9
Oct. 10
Oct. 11
Oct. 12
Oct. 13
Oct. 14
Oct. 15
Oct. 16
Oct. 17
Oct. 18
Oct. 19
Oct. 20
Oct. 21
Oct. 22
Oct. 23
Oct. 24
Oct. 25
Oct. 26
Oct. 27
Oct. 28
Oct. 29
Oct. 30
Oct. 31
Nov. 1
Nov. 2
Nov. 3
Nov. 4
Nov. 5
Nov. 6
Nov. 7
Nov. 8
Nov. 9
Nov. 10
Nov. 11
Nov. 12
Nov. 13
Nov. 14
Nov. 15
Nov. 16
Nov. 17
Nov. 18
Nov. 19
Nov. 20
Nov. 21
Nov. 22
Nov. 23
Nov. 24
Nov. 25
Nov. 26
Nov. 27
Nov. 28
Nov. 29
Nov. 30
Dec. 1
Dec. 2
Dec. 3
Dec. 4
Dec. 5
Dec. 6
Dec. 7
Dec. 8
Dec. 9
Dec. 10
Dec. 11
Dec. 12
Dec. 13
Dec. 14
Dec. 15
Dec. 16
Dec. 17
Dec. 18
Dec. 19
Dec. 20
Dec. 21
Dec. 22
Dec. 23
Dec. 24
Dec. 25
Dec. 26
Dec. 27
Dec. 28
Dec. 29
Dec. 30
Dec. 31
Jan. 1, 1780
Jan. 2
Jan. 3
Jan. 4
Jan. 5
Jan. 6
Jan. 7
Jan. 8
Jan. 9
Jan. 10
Jan. 11
Jan. 12
Jan. 13
Jan. 14
Jan. 15
Jan. 16
Jan. 17
Jan. 18
Jan. 19
Jan. 20
Jan. 21
Jan. 22
Jan. 23
Jan. 24
Jan. 25
Jan. 26
Jan. 27
Jan. 28
Jan. 29
Jan. 30
Jan. 31
Feb. 1
Feb. 2
Feb. 3
Feb. 4
Feb. 5
Feb. 6
Feb. 7
Feb. 8
Feb. 9
Feb. 10
Feb. 11
Feb. 12
Feb. 13
Feb. 14
Feb. 15
Feb. 16
Feb. 17
Feb. 18
Feb. 19
Feb. 20
Feb. 21
Feb. 22
Feb. 23
Feb. 24
Feb. 25
Feb. 26
Feb. 27
Feb. 28
Mar. 1
Mar. 2
Mar. 3
Mar. 4
Mar. 5
Mar. 6
Mar. 7
Mar. 8
Mar. 9
Mar. 10
Mar. 11
Mar. 12
Mar. 13
Mar. 14
Mar. 15
Mar. 16
Mar. 17
Mar. 18
Mar. 19
Mar. 20
Mar. 21
Mar. 22
Mar. 23
Mar. 24
Mar. 25
Mar. 26
Mar. 27
Mar. 28
Mar. 29
Mar. 30
Mar. 31
Apr. 1
Apr. 2
Apr. 3
Apr. 4
Apr. 5
Apr. 6
Apr. 7
Apr. 8
Apr. 9
Apr. 10
Apr. 11
Apr. 12
Apr. 13
Apr. 14
Apr. 15
Apr. 16
Apr. 17
Apr. 18
Apr. 19
Apr. 20
Apr. 21
Apr. 22
Apr. 23
Apr. 24
Apr. 25
Apr. 26
Apr. 27
Apr. 28
Apr. 29
Apr. 30
May 1
May 2
May 3
May 4
May 5
May 6
May 7
May 8
May 9
May 10
May 11
May 12
May 13
May 14
May 15
May 16
May 17
May 18
May 19
May 20
May 21
May 22
May 23
May 24
May 25
May 26
May 27
May 28
May 29
May 30
May 31
June 1
June 2
June 3
June 4
June 5
June 6
June 7
June 8
June 9
June 10
June 11
June 12
June 13
June 14
June 15
June 16
June 17
June 18
June 19
June 20
June 21
June 22
June 23
June 24
June 25
June 26
June 27
June 28
June 29
June 30
July 1
July 2
July 3
July 4
July 5
July 6
July 7
July 8
July 9
July 10
July 11
July 12
July 13
July 14
July 15
July 16
July 17
July 18
July 19
July 20
July 21
July 22
July 23
July 24
July 25
July 26
July 27
July 28
July 29
July 30
July 31
Aug. 1
Aug. 2
Aug. 3
Aug. 4
Aug. 5
Aug. 6
Aug. 7
Aug. 8
Aug. 9
Aug. 10
Aug. 11
Aug. 12
Aug. 13
Aug. 14
Aug. 15
Aug. 16
Aug. 17
Aug. 18
Aug. 19
Aug. 20
Aug. 21
Aug. 22
Aug. 23
Aug. 24
Aug. 25
Aug. 26
Aug. 27
Aug. 28
Aug. 29
Aug. 30
Aug. 31
Sept. 1
Sept. 2
Sept. 3
Sept. 4
Sept. 5
Sept. 6
Sept. 7
Sept. 8
Sept. 9
Sept. 10
Sept. 11
Sept. 12
Sept. 13
Sept. 14
Sept. 15
Sept. 16
Sept. 17
Sept. 18
Sept. 19
Sept. 20
Sept. 21
Sept. 22
Sept. 23
Sept. 24
Sept. 25
Sept. 26
Sept. 27
Sept. 28
Sept. 29
Sept. 30
Oct. 1
Oct. 2
Oct. 3
Oct. 4
Oct. 5
Oct. 6
Oct. 7
Oct. 8
Oct. 9
Oct. 10
Oct. 11
Oct. 12
Oct. 13
Oct. 14
Oct. 15
Oct. 16
Oct. 17
Oct. 18
Oct. 19
Oct. 20
Oct. 21
Oct. 22
Oct. 23
Oct. 24
Oct. 25
Oct. 26
Oct. 27
Oct. 28
Oct. 29
Oct. 30
Oct. 31
Nov. 1
Nov. 2
Nov. 3
Nov. 4
Nov. 5
Nov. 6
Nov. 7
Nov. 8
Nov. 9
Nov. 10
Nov. 11
Nov. 12
Nov. 13
Nov. 14
Nov. 15
Nov. 16
Nov. 17
Nov. 18
Nov. 19
Nov. 20
Nov. 21
Nov. 22
Nov. 23
Nov. 24
Nov. 25
Nov. 26
Nov. 27
Nov. 28
Nov. 29
Nov. 30
Dec. 1
Dec. 2
Dec. 3
Dec. 4
Dec. 5
Dec. 6
Dec. 7
Dec. 8
Dec. 9
Dec. 10
Dec. 11
Dec. 12
Dec. 13
Dec. 14
Dec. 15
Dec. 16
Dec. 17
Dec. 18
Dec. 19
Dec. 20
Dec. 21
Dec. 22
Dec. 23
Dec. 24
Dec. 25
Dec. 26
Dec. 27
Dec. 28
Dec. 29
Dec. 30
Dec. 31
Jan. 1, 1781
Jan. 2
Jan. 3
Jan. 4
Jan. 5
Jan. 6
Jan. 7
Jan. 8
Jan. 9
Jan. 10
Jan. 11
Jan. 12
Jan. 13
Jan. 14
Jan. 15
Jan. 16
Jan. 17
Jan. 18
Jan. 19
Jan. 20
Jan. 21
Jan. 22
Jan. 23
Jan. 24
Jan. 25
Jan. 26
Jan. 27
Jan. 28
Jan. 29
Jan. 30
Jan. 31
Feb. 1
Feb. 2
Feb. 3
Feb. 4
Feb. 5
Feb. 6
Feb. 7
Feb. 8
Feb. 9
Feb. 10
Feb. 11
Feb. 12
Feb. 13
Feb. 14
Feb. 15
Feb. 16
Feb. 17
Feb. 18
Feb. 19
Feb. 20
Feb. 21
Feb. 22
Feb. 23
Feb. 24
Feb. 25
Feb. 26
Feb. 27
Feb. 28
Mar. 1
Mar. 2
Mar. 3
Mar. 4
Mar. 5
Mar. 6
Mar. 7
Mar. 8
Mar. 9
Mar. 10
Mar. 11
Mar. 12
Mar. 13
Mar. 14
Mar. 15
Mar. 16
Mar. 17
Mar. 18
Mar. 19
Mar. 20
Mar. 21
Mar. 22
Mar. 23
Mar. 24
Mar. 25
Mar. 26
Mar. 27
Mar. 28
Mar. 29
Mar. 30
Mar. 31
Apr. 1
Apr. 2
Apr. 3
Apr. 4
Apr. 5
Apr. 6
Apr. 7
Apr. 8
Apr. 9
Apr. 10
Apr. 11
Apr. 12
Apr. 13
Apr. 14
Apr. 15
Apr. 16
Apr. 17
Apr. 18
Apr. 19
Apr. 20
Apr. 21
Apr. 22
Apr. 23
Apr. 24
Apr. 25
Apr. 26
Apr. 27
Apr. 28
Apr. 29
Apr. 30
May 1
May 2
May 3
May 4
May 5
May 6
May 7
May 8
May 9
May 10
May 11
May 12
May 13
May 14
May 15
May 16
May 17
May 18
May 19
May 20
May 21
May 22
May 23
May 24
May 25
May 26
May 27
May 28
May 29
May 30
May 31
June 1
June 2
June 3
June 4
June 5
June 6
June 7
June 8
June 9
June 10
June 11
June 12
June 13
June 14
June 15
June 16
June 17
June 18
June 19
June 20
June 21
June 22
June 23
June 24
June 25
June 26
June 27
June 28
June 29
June 30
July 1
July 2
July 3
July 4
July 5
July 6
July 7
July 8
July 9
July 10
July 11
July 12
July 13
July 14
July 15
July 16
July 17
July 18
July 19
July 20
July 21
July 22
July 23
July 24
July 25
July 26
July 27
July 28
July 29
July 30
July 31
Aug. 1
Aug. 2
Aug. 3
Aug. 4
Aug. 5
Aug. 6
Aug. 7
Aug. 8
Aug. 9
Aug. 10
Aug. 11
Aug. 12
Aug. 13
Aug. 14
Aug. 15
Aug. 16
Aug. 17
Aug. 18
Aug. 19
Aug. 20
Aug. 21
Aug. 22
Aug. 23
Aug. 24
Aug. 25
Aug. 26
Aug. 27
Aug. 28
Aug. 29
Aug. 30
Aug. 31
Sept. 1
Sept. 2
Sept. 3
Sept. 4
Sept. 5
Sept. 6
Sept. 7
Sept. 8
Sept. 9
Sept. 10
Sept. 11
Sept. 12
Sept. 13
Sept. 14
Sept. 15
Sept. 16
Sept. 17
Sept. 18
Sept. 19
Sept. 20
Sept. 21
Sept. 22
Sept. 23
Sept. 24
Sept. 25
Sept. 26
Sept. 27
Sept. 28
Sept. 29
Sept. 30
Oct. 1
Oct. 2
Oct. 3
Oct. 4
Oct. 5
Oct. 6
Oct. 7
Oct. 8
Oct. 9
Oct. 10
Oct. 11
Oct. 12
Oct. 13
Oct. 14
Oct. 15
Oct. 16
Oct. 17
Oct. 18
Oct. 19
Oct. 20
Oct. 21
Oct. 22
Oct. 23
Oct. 24
Oct. 25
Oct. 26
Oct. 27
Oct. 28
Oct. 29
Oct. 30
Oct. 31
Nov. 1
Nov. 2
Nov. 3
Nov. 4
Nov. 5
Nov. 6
Nov. 7
Nov. 8
Nov. 9
Nov. 10
Nov. 11
Nov. 12
Nov. 13
Nov. 14
Nov. 15
Nov. 16
Nov. 17
Nov. 18
Nov. 19
Nov. 20
Nov. 21
Nov. 22
Nov. 23
Nov. 24
Nov. 25
Nov. 26
Nov. 27
Nov. 28
Nov. 29
Nov. 30
Dec. 1
Dec. 2
Dec. 3
Dec. 4
Dec. 5
Dec. 6
Dec. 7
Dec. 8
Dec. 9
Dec. 10
Dec. 11
Dec. 12
Dec. 13
Dec. 14
Dec. 15
Dec. 16
Dec. 17
Dec. 18
Dec. 19
Dec. 20
Dec. 21
Dec. 22
Dec. 23
Dec. 24
Dec. 25
Dec. 26
Dec. 27
Dec. 28
Dec. 29
Dec. 30
Dec. 31
Jan. 1, 1782
Jan. 2
Jan. 3
Jan. 4
Jan. 5
Jan. 6
Jan. 7
Jan. 8
Jan. 9
Jan. 10
Jan. 11
Jan. 12
Jan. 13
Jan. 14
Jan. 15
Jan. 16
Jan. 17
Jan. 18
Jan. 19
Jan. 20
Jan. 21
Jan. 22
Jan. 23
Jan. 24
Jan. 25
Jan. 26
Jan. 27
Jan. 28
Jan. 29
Jan. 30
Jan. 31
Feb. 1
Feb. 2
Feb. 3
Feb. 4
Feb. 5
Feb. 6
Feb. 7
Feb. 8
Feb. 9
Feb. 10
Feb. 11
Feb. 12
Feb. 13
Feb. 14
Feb. 15
Feb. 16
Feb. 17
Feb. 18
Feb. 19
Feb. 20
Feb. 21
Feb. 22
Feb. 23
Feb. 24
Feb. 25
Feb. 26
Feb. 27
Feb. 28
Mar. 1
Mar. 2
Mar. 3
Mar. 4
Mar. 5
Mar. 6
Mar. 7
Mar. 8
Mar. 9
Mar. 10
Mar. 11
Mar. 12
Mar. 13
Mar. 14
Mar. 15
Mar. 16
Mar. 17
Mar. 18
Mar. 19
Mar. 20
Mar. 21
Mar. 22
Mar. 23
Mar. 24
Mar. 25
Mar. 26
Mar. 27
Mar. 28
Mar. 29
Mar. 30
Mar. 31
Apr. 1
Apr. 2
Apr. 3
Apr. 4
Apr. 5
Apr. 6
Apr. 7
Apr. 8
Apr. 9
Apr. 10
Apr. 11
Apr. 12
Apr. 13
Apr. 14
Apr. 15
Apr. 16
Apr. 17
Apr. 18
Apr. 19
Apr. 20
Apr. 21
Apr. 22
Apr. 23
Apr. 24
Apr. 25
Apr. 26
Apr. 27
Apr. 28
Apr. 29
Apr. 30
May 1
May 2
May 3
May 4
May 5
May 6
May 7
May 8
May 9
May 10
May 11
May 12
May 13
May 14
May 15
May 16
May 17
May 18
May 19
May 20
May 21
May 22
May 23
May 24
May 25
May 26
May 27
May 28
May 29
May 30
May 31
June 1
June 2
June 3
June 4
June 5
June 6
June 7
June 8
June 9
June 10
June 11
June 12
June 13
June 14
June 15
June 16
June 17
June 18
June 19
June 20
June 21
June 22
June 23
June 24
June 25
June 26
June 27
June 28
June 29
June 30
July 1
July 2
July 3
July 4
July 5
July 6
July 7
July 8
July 9
July 10
July 11
July 12
July 13
July 14
July 15
July 16
July 17
July 18
July 19
July 20
July 21
July 22
July 23
July 24
July 25
July 26
July 27
July 28
July 29
July 30
July 31
Aug. 1
Aug. 2
Aug. 3
Aug. 4
Aug. 5
Aug. 6
Aug. 7
Aug. 8
Aug. 9
Aug. 10
Aug. 11
Aug. 12
Aug. 13
Aug. 14
Aug. 15
Aug. 16
Aug. 17
Aug. 18
Aug. 19
Aug. 20
Aug. 21
Aug. 22
Aug. 23
Aug. 24
Aug. 25
Aug. 26
Aug. 27
Aug. 28
Aug. 29
Aug. 30
Aug. 31
Sept. 1
Sept. 2
Sept. 3
Sept. 4
Sept. 5
Sept. 6
Sept. 7
Sept. 8
Sept. 9
Sept. 10
Sept. 11
Sept. 12
Sept. 13
Sept. 14
Sept. 15
Sept. 16
Sept. 17
Sept. 18
Sept. 19
Sept. 20
Sept. 21
Sept. 22
Sept. 23
Sept. 24
Sept. 25
Sept. 26
Sept. 27
Sept. 28
Sept. 29
Sept. 30
Oct. 1
Oct. 2
Oct. 3
Oct. 4
Oct. 5
Oct. 6
Oct. 7
Oct. 8
Oct. 9
Oct. 10
Oct. 11
Oct. 12
Oct. 13
Oct. 14
Oct. 15
Oct. 16
Oct. 17
Oct. 18
Oct. 19
Oct. 20
Oct. 21
Oct. 22
Oct. 23
Oct. 24
Oct. 25
Oct. 26
Oct. 27
Oct. 28
Oct. 29
Oct. 30
Oct. 31
Nov. 1
Nov. 2
Nov. 3
Nov. 4
Nov. 5
Nov. 6
Nov. 7
Nov. 8
Nov. 9
Nov. 10
Nov. 11
Nov. 12
Nov. 13
Nov. 14
Nov. 15
Nov. 16
Nov. 17
Nov. 18
Nov. 19
Nov. 20
Nov. 21
Nov. 22
Nov. 23
Nov. 24
Nov. 25
Nov. 26
Nov. 27
Nov. 28
Nov. 29
Nov. 30
Dec. 1
Dec. 2
Dec. 3
Dec. 4
Dec. 5
Dec. 6
Dec. 7
Dec. 8
Dec. 9
Dec. 10
Dec. 11
Dec. 12
Dec. 13
Dec. 14
Dec. 15
Dec. 16
Dec. 17
Dec. 18
Dec. 19
Dec. 20
Dec. 21
Dec. 22
Dec. 23
Dec. 24
Dec. 25
Dec. 26
Dec. 27
Dec. 28
Dec. 29
Dec. 30
Dec. 31
Jan. 1, 1783
Jan. 2
Jan. 3
Jan. 4
Jan. 5
Jan. 6
Jan. 7
Jan. 8
Jan. 9
Jan. 10
Jan. 11
Jan. 12
Jan. 13
Jan. 14
Jan. 15
Jan. 16
Jan. 17
Jan. 18
Jan. 19
Jan. 20
Jan. 21
Jan. 22
Jan. 23
Jan. 24
Jan. 25
Jan. 26
Jan. 27
Jan. 28
Jan. 29
Jan. 30
Jan. 31
Feb. 1
Feb. 2
Feb. 3
Feb. 4
Feb. 5
Feb. 6
Feb. 7
Feb. 8
Feb. 9
Feb. 10
Feb. 11
Feb. 12
Feb. 13
Feb. 14
Feb. 15
Feb. 16
Feb. 17
Feb. 18
Feb. 19
Feb. 20
Feb. 21
Feb. 22
Feb. 23
Feb. 24
Feb. 25
Feb. 26
Feb. 27
Feb. 28
Mar. 1
Mar. 2
Mar. 3
Mar. 4
Mar. 5
Mar. 6
Mar. 7
Mar. 8
Mar. 9
Mar. 10
Mar. 11
Mar. 12
Mar. 13
Mar. 14
Mar. 15
Mar. 16
Mar. 17
Mar. 18
Mar. 19
Mar. 20
Mar. 21
Mar. 22
Mar. 23
Mar. 24
Mar. 25
Mar. 26
Mar. 27
Mar. 28
Mar. 29
Mar. 30
Mar. 31
Apr. 1
Apr. 2
Apr. 3
Apr. 4
Apr. 5
Apr. 6
Apr. 7
Apr. 8
Apr. 9
Apr. 10
Apr. 11
Apr. 12
Apr. 13
Apr. 14
Apr. 15
Apr. 16
Apr. 17
Apr. 18
Apr. 19
Apr. 20
Apr. 21
Apr. 22
Apr. 23
Apr. 24
Apr. 25
Apr. 26
Apr. 27
Apr. 28
Apr. 29
Apr. 30
May 1
May 2
May 3
May 4
May 5
May 6
May 7
May 8
May 9
May 10
May 11
May 12
May 13
May 14
May 15
May 16
May 17
May 18
May 19
May 20
May 21
May 22
May 23
May 24
May 25
May 26
May 27
May 28
May 29
May 30
May 31
June 1
June 2
June 3
June 4
June 5
June 6
June 7
June 8
June 9
June 10
June 11
June 12
June 13
June 14
June 15
June 16
June 17
June 18
June 19
June 20
June 21
June 22
June 23
June 24
June 25
June 26
June 27
June 28
June 29
June 30
July 1
July 2
July 3
July 4
July 5
July 6
July 7
July 8
July 9
July 10
July 11
July 12
July 13
July 14
July 15
July 16
July 17
July 18
July 19
July 20
July 21
July 22
July 23
July 24
July 25
July 26
July 27
July 28
July 29
July 30
July 31
Aug. 1
Aug. 2
Aug. 3
Aug. 4
Aug. 5
Aug. 6
Aug. 7
Aug. 8
Aug. 9
Aug. 10
Aug. 11
Aug. 12
Aug. 13
Aug. 14
Aug. 15
Aug. 16
Aug. 17
Aug. 18
Aug. 19
Aug. 20
Aug. 21
Aug. 22
Aug. 23
Aug. 24
Aug. 25
Aug. 26
Aug. 27
Aug. 28
Aug. 29
Aug. 30
Aug. 31
Sept. 1
Sept. 2
Sept. 3
Sept. 4
Sept. 5
Sept. 6
Sept. 7
Sept. 8
Sept. 9
Sept. 10
Sept. 11
Sept. 12
Sept. 13
Sept. 14
Sept. 15
Sept. 16
Sept. 17
Sept. 18
Sept. 19
Sept. 20
Sept. 21
Sept. 22
Sept. 23
Sept. 24
Sept. 25
Sept. 26
Sept. 27
Sept. 28
Sept. 29
Sept. 30
Oct. 1
Oct. 2
Oct. 3
Oct. 4
Oct. 5
Oct. 6
Oct. 7
Oct. 8
Oct. 9
Oct. 10
Oct. 11
Oct. 12
Oct. 13
Oct. 14
Oct. 15
Oct. 16
Oct. 17
Oct. 18
Oct. 19
Oct. 20
Oct. 21
Oct. 22
Oct. 23
Oct. 24
Oct. 25
Oct. 26
Oct. 27
Oct. 28
Oct. 29
Oct. 30
Oct. 31
Nov. 1
Nov. 2
Nov. 3
Nov. 4
Nov. 5
Nov. 6
Nov. 7
Nov. 8
Nov. 9
Nov. 10
Nov. 11
Nov. 12
Nov. 13
Nov. 14
Nov. 15
Nov. 16
Nov. 17
Nov. 18
Nov. 19
Nov. 20
Nov. 21
Nov. 22
Nov. 23
Nov. 24
Nov. 25
Nov. 26
Nov. 27
Nov. 28
Nov. 29
Nov. 30
Dec. 1
Dec. 2
Dec. 3
Dec. 4
Dec. 5
Dec. 6
Dec. 7
Dec. 8
Dec. 9
Dec. 10
Dec. 11
Dec. 12
Dec. 13
Dec. 14
Dec. 15
Dec. 16
Dec. 17
Dec. 18
Dec. 19
Dec. 20
Dec. 21
Dec. 22
Dec. 23
Dec. 24
Dec. 25
Dec. 26
Dec. 27
Dec. 28
Dec. 29
Dec. 30
Dec. 31
Jan. 1, 1784
Jan. 2
Jan. 3
Jan. 4
Jan. 5
Jan. 6
Jan. 7
Jan. 8
Jan. 9
Jan. 10
Jan. 11
Jan. 12
Jan. 13
Jan. 14
Jan. 15
Jan. 16
Jan. 17
Jan. 18
Jan. 19
Jan. 20
Jan. 21
Jan. 22
Jan. 23
Jan. 24
Jan. 25
Jan. 26
Jan. 27
Jan. 28
Jan. 29
Jan. 30
Jan. 31
Feb. 1
Feb. 2
Feb. 3
Feb. 4
Feb. 5
Feb. 6
Feb. 7
Feb. 8
Feb. 9
Feb. 10
Feb. 11
Feb. 12
Feb. 13
Feb. 14
Feb. 15
Feb. 16
Feb. 17
Feb. 18
Feb. 19
Feb. 20
Feb. 21
Feb. 22
Feb. 23
Feb. 24
Feb. 25
Feb. 26
Feb. 27
Feb. 28
Mar. 1
Mar. 2
Mar. 3
Mar. 4
Mar. 5
Mar. 6
Mar. 7
Mar. 8
Mar. 9
Mar. 10
Mar. 11
Mar. 12
Mar. 13
Mar. 14
Mar. 15
Mar. 16
Mar. 17
Mar. 18
Mar. 19
Mar. 20
Mar. 21
Mar. 22
Mar. 23
Mar. 24
Mar. 25
Mar. 26
Mar. 27
Mar. 28
Mar. 29
Mar. 30
Mar. 31
Apr. 1
Apr. 2
Apr. 3
Apr. 4
Apr. 5
Apr. 6
Apr. 7
Apr. 8
Apr. 9
Apr. 10
Apr. 11
Apr. 12
Apr. 13
Apr. 14
Apr. 15
Apr. 16
Apr. 17
Apr. 18
Apr. 19
Apr. 20
Apr. 21
Apr. 22
Apr. 23
Apr. 24
Apr. 25
Apr. 26
Apr. 27
Apr. 28
Apr. 29
Apr. 30
May 1
May 2
May 3
May 4
May 5
May 6
May 7
May 8
May 9
May 10
May 11
May 12
May 13
May 14
May 15
May 16
May 17
May 18
May 19
May 20
May 21
May 22
May 23
May 24
May 25
May 26
May 27
May 28
May 29
May 30
May 31
June 1
June 2
June 3
June 4
June 5
June 6
June 7
June 8
June 9
June 10
June 11
June 12
June 13
June 14
June 15
June 16
June 17
June 18
June 19
June 20
June 21
June 22
June 23
June 24
June 25
June 26
June 27
June 28
June 29
June 30
July 1
July 2
July 3
July 4
July 5
July 6
July 7
July 8
July 9
July 10
July 11
July 12
July 13
July 14
July 15
July 16
July 17
July 18
July 19
July 20
July 21
July 22
July 23
July 24
July 25
July 26
July 27
July 28
July 29
July 30
July 31
Aug.

Cornwallis's return while he advanced to overwhelm the Hessian. But the Napoleonic project was destined not to be carried into effect. Some of Greene's troops had already crossed the stream when word arrived from Sullivan that Cornwallis was not where he was supposed to be. This looked as though Cornwallis had merely made a feint and was ready to support Knyphausen; Greene's advanced detachment was recalled; the opportunity was lost. About an hour later, a civilian rode in haste to Washington's headquarters and announced that the British had crossed the two branches of the Brandywine and were marching down so rapidly that if the Americans did not make haste they would be surrounded. Almost immediately a dispatch from Sullivan arrived saying that "Colonel Bland has at this moment sent me word that the enemy are in the rear of my right, coming down."

1777

Uniform of First Troop, Philadelphia Light Horse
(From original drawing by Harry A. Ogden)

As on Long Island, the battle was thus virtually decided before it was begun. Owing to the failure adequately to guard the upper fords and to keep out scouting parties (for which Sullivan has been blamed by some), the Americans found themselves in a position escape from which was all that they could reasonably hope. Stirling's and Stephen's divisions deployed on the hill southwest of Birmingham meeting-house, but, before Sullivan got his own division into position, Cornwallis began the attack. Sullivan's division was forced into confusion and badly routed; the two other divisions fought vigorously, but they were outnumbered, their flank was exposed, and in the end they were driven back. While trying to rally some of the fugitives, Lafayette received a severe wound in the leg.

1777 Cornwallis Pushes the Action

Map of the Battle of Brandywine

The British Win the Battle

Meanwhile, Washington was hastening with Greene's division to support the right wing. Greene moved with commendable alacrity, and, after allowing the fugitives to pass, seized a narrow defile with woods on both sides and held it until nightfall. In the meantime, Knyphausen pushed across Chads Ford. For a time, Wayne, Proctor, and Maxwell held him in check, but, hearing of the defeat of the right wing, they fell back fighting and in good order toward Chester where that night the broken army was reunited. The American loss was about a thousand men, a howitzer, and ten cannons. The British loss in men was not much if any less. 1777

On the following day, Washington marched his army from Chester to Philadelphia. After two days' rest at Germantown, he recrossed the Schuylkill and, on the sixteenth, was again facing the enemy. A pitched battle was imminent and skirmishing had actually begun when a storm of extraordinary violence wet the ammunition of both parties and thus forced a cessation of hostilities. Washington retired behind the Schuylkill leaving Wayne to hang upon the flanks and rear of the enemy and to attack him if opportunity favored. On the nineteenth, Wayne was at Paoli, within half a mile of Howe's army and sure that his position was unknown to the enemy. But Howe, well informed as to Wayne's movements, sent out a strong detachment commanded by Major-general Grey and led by Tory guides. About midnight of the twentieth, an hour or two before Wayne intended to strike Howe, Grey struck Wayne. Depending wholly on the bayonet, the British

Wayne at Paoli

Standard of the Philadelphia Light Horse Troop of 1775
(Now in the possession of the First Troop, Philadelphia City Cavalry. The reproduction, made through courtesy of Captain J. C. Groome, shows its present appearance)

1777 suddenly fell upon the American pickets. Before Wayne's men could form, Grey's infantry and dragoons were upon them with bayonet thrust and sabre cut and working dreadful havoc. The Americans were driven two miles through the woods and more than a hundred and fifty were killed or wounded. No one could justly complain of the chance of battle, but the action is recorded as the "Paoli Massacre."

Anthony Wayne

The Second Flight of Congress

The roar of the artillery at Brandywine swept through the streets of Philadelphia and, in excited groups, the citizens discussed the situation. On the seventeenth, congress made Washington a sixty days' dictator in the territory within seventy miles of the headquarters of the American army. The regnant confusion was worse confounded by the arrival at one o'clock

September 19 on the morning of the nineteenth of a report that the British could cross the Schuylkill and be in the city in a few hours. The report was premature, but its effect was picturesque. Members of congress were roused from their slumbers and stood not on ceremony in taking leave of the dangerous locality. They gathered at Lancaster and, on the twenty-seventh, adjourned to York where they continued until the British evacuated Philadelphia. Many of the citizens of the capital followed the congressional example. "It was a beautiful, still, moonlight morning, and the streets as full of men, women and children as on a market day," wrote Thomas Paine to Franklin. 1777

When Howe again took up his march toward Philadelphia, he found that the Americans had thrown up defenses at Swedes Ford (Norristown) and therefore turned toward the west as if to cross the Schuylkill at a higher point. Fearing the loss of his stores at Reading, Washington marched in that direction with the river between him and Howe. At Potts Grove (Pottstown), he learned that Howe, having crossed the river at Flatland and Gordons fords (near Valley Forge), was then well on his way toward Philadelphia. On the twenty-fifth, Howe's army encamped at Germantown and, on the following morning, Cornwallis marched into Philadelphia with three thousand troops. The bands played "God save the King" and the Tories shouted "with acclamations of joy." A line of defenses extending from river to river north of the city was immediately begun. Admiral Howe was in the lower Delaware, but the British fleet could not sail up the river because of a chevaux de frise at Billingsport and several forts held by the Americans. On the twenty-seventh, the American flotilla began to bombard the city, but the frigate "Delaware" ran aground and was captured and the smaller vessels were driven off without doing much injury.

Howe in Philadelphia

September 26

Howe's army was encamped on the general line of Schoolhouse lane and Lime-kiln road crossing the single street of Germantown at the market-place. Knyphausen held the left toward the Schuylkill. Grant and Matthews and Simcoe's "Queen's Rangers" were on the right extending toward the York road. The fortieth regiment was encamped in a field opposite the large stone mansion of Benjamin Chew, the late chief-justice of the province. The second battalion of light infantry was in the advance at Mount Pleasant with pickets at Mount Airy, still further out.

Howe at Germantown

Washington was at the Metuchen Hills, fifteen miles from Philadelphia. Having been reinforced, he resolved to move against the British forces at Germantown. His

Washington's Plan of Attack

1777 plan was to attack everywhere along the British line at five o'clock in the morning and to rout the enemy before reinforcements could arrive from Philadelphia. Sullivan was to move with his division and Wayne's, flanked by Conway's brigade and followed by Washington, down the Reading road or Germantown street; Greene was to advance by the Lime-kiln road; Armstrong, with the Pennsylvania militia, was to advance by the Manatawny road to turn the enemy's left; while Smallwood and Forman, with Maryland and New Jersey militia, were to march by the York road and seek to turn the British right. The main reliance was on the nine thousand continentals of the two middle columns. The advance was made on the evening of the third of October.

The Advance of Sullivan and Wayne

The night was dark, in the morning there was a fog, and the approach of the Americans was not discovered. Sullivan was at Chestnut Hill by sunrise and waited two hours for Greene (who had the longer route) to get into position so that the attacks might be made simultaneously. He then advanced and drove the pickets at Mount Airy back upon the light infantry and then drove the infantry back through the fog. Sullivan's and Wayne's divisions swept down on both sides of the road, driving the light infantry and the fortieth regiment, which had hurried forward only to be forced back. On neither side could the troops see forty yards ahead, but Wayne's men called to each other and rushed into the unseen, goaded by the remembrance of Paoli. Down past Chew's stone house they came—an auspicious opening of the battle. As the reserve, led by Stirling and accompanied by Washington, passed the stone mansion, six companies of the British fortieth, who had therein taken refuge, opened fire. Stirling tried to drive them out, but the light field-pieces made no impression on the heavy walls and attempts to set the house on fire were without effect. The struggle lasted more than an hour, holding Stirling back from his support of Sullivan and Wayne, confusing their men with the noise of battle behind them, and misleading Greene as to the position of the enemy.

October 4

ATTACK ON THE CHEW HOUSE AT THE BATTLE OF GERMANTOWN

(From historical painting, by Edward Lamson Henry, owned by Mrs. Samuel Chew. Reproduced from photograph colored in close facsimile of original. Copyrighted, 1909, by C. S. Bradford, Philadelphia)

1777 Greene was Tardy

Meanwhile, Greene had been advancing along Lime-kiln road to come up on Sullivan's left and so to form a continuous line directly in Howe's front. But Greene was more than half an hour late and, in the night, a British battalion had been moved forward, thus bringing him into contact with the enemy sooner than he expected. In spite of some confusion, he forced the enemy back to the market-place and attacked the British right under Grant; after heavy fighting, he was driven back and one of his regiments was captured.

Map of the Battle of Germantown

While Greene was advancing on Lime-kiln road, General Stephen of his command heard the firing at Chew's house. Stephen seems to have been so drunk that he abruptly left his line of march and, following the sound of battle, struck the rear of Wayne's brigade. In the fog and smoke, each party mistook the other for the British. Confused by this attack, Wayne's brigade fell back two miles, uncovering Sullivan's flank and forcing him to retreat. From Philadelphia, Cornwallis brought up English battalions, Hessian grenadiers, and a squadron of dragoons on the double quick. The day was lost and Washington gave orders to retreat. At Whitemarsh, Wayne posted a battery on the hill and checked the pursuit. The American loss was nearly eleven hundred. The British loss was five hundred and twenty-one, including General Agnew. Greene's delay and management have been much blamed and much defended. 1777 The Day is Lost

Private, Seventeenth Light Dragoons (British), 1763–86
(From original drawing by Harry A. Ogden)

Early in October, Washington's army was in camp north of the Schuylkill, on Perkiomy Creek and near Pennybecker Mill, whence it advanced until, early in November, it was at Whitemarsh. On the nineteenth of October, Howe moved his army from Germantown into the city where he was really in a state of siege with provisions cut off by land, and his brother's fleet held at a distance by the defenses of the Delaware. Two days later, Donop led his Hessians into New Jersey; an assault upon Fort Mercer at Red Bank, then commanded by Colonel Christopher Greene, resulted in a severe repulse of the besiegers, the mortal wounding of Colonel Donop, and the destruction of two of Admiral Operations on the Delaware

October 22

1777 Howe's vessels. A regular siege of Fort Mifflin on Mud Island was then undertaken; after a brave defense, November 15 the garrison withdrew to Fort Mercer and the grenadiers of the royal guards occupied the island. Three days later, Cornwallis crossed into New Jersey. Washington sent Greene to take command of the troops there and to check his progress, but the British demonstration was

Map of Operations on the Delaware

November 20 so formidable that Fort Mercer was abandoned and destroyed. As an incident of Greene's movement, Lafayette had a lively skirmish with a body of Hessians in the rear of Cornwallis's army and drove them back upon their supports. After several narrow escapes, Lafayette rejoined Greene with a loss of only one man killed and six wounded. On the first of December, he was assigned to the command of the division lately held by Stephen who had been dismissed from the army. Some of the American vessels in the river succeeded in running past Howe's batteries at Philadelphia; others were burned to prevent their falling into British hands. The obstructions in the river were removed and provisions and stores became more abundant in the city. 1777

About the end of October, Washington had taken up his headquarters at Whitemarsh; about the middle of December he went into winter quarters at Valley Forge; the route thither was tracked in blood as the men, many of them destitute of shoes and stockings, painfully picked their way over the frozen ground. Log huts chinked with clay were built as quickly as possible, but, before they were ready for occupancy, there was great suffering. Thus the campaign for Philadelphia closed with the royal forces in possession of the rebel capital. In Winter Quarters

CHAPTER IV

SARATOGA

Germain's Strategy

THE British plan of operations for the campaign "had been maturely and copiously discussed by the British Cabinet, and had been hopelessly and grievously bungled." Ignoring Sir William Howe's scheme of forcing Washington to risk a battle in order to protect the capital of the confederacy and then crushing "the rebel regular army," Lord Germain had "conceived the ambitious hope of compensating for deficiency of numbers by brilliant and novel strategy." Hence the triple plan outlined in the preceding chapter. Burgoyne was to come down from Canada by way of Lake Champlain, Saint Leger was to go up the Saint Lawrence to Lake Ontario and thence come down by way of Oswego and the Mohawk valley, while Howe was to force his way from New York up the Hudson toward Albany where the three columns were to converge upon the Americans—a "network of complicated and delicate manœuvres." Trevelyan pithily remarks that Lord Germain "exercised Lord Chatham's functions; but he had not mastered Lord Chatham's methods."

Difficulties and Dangers

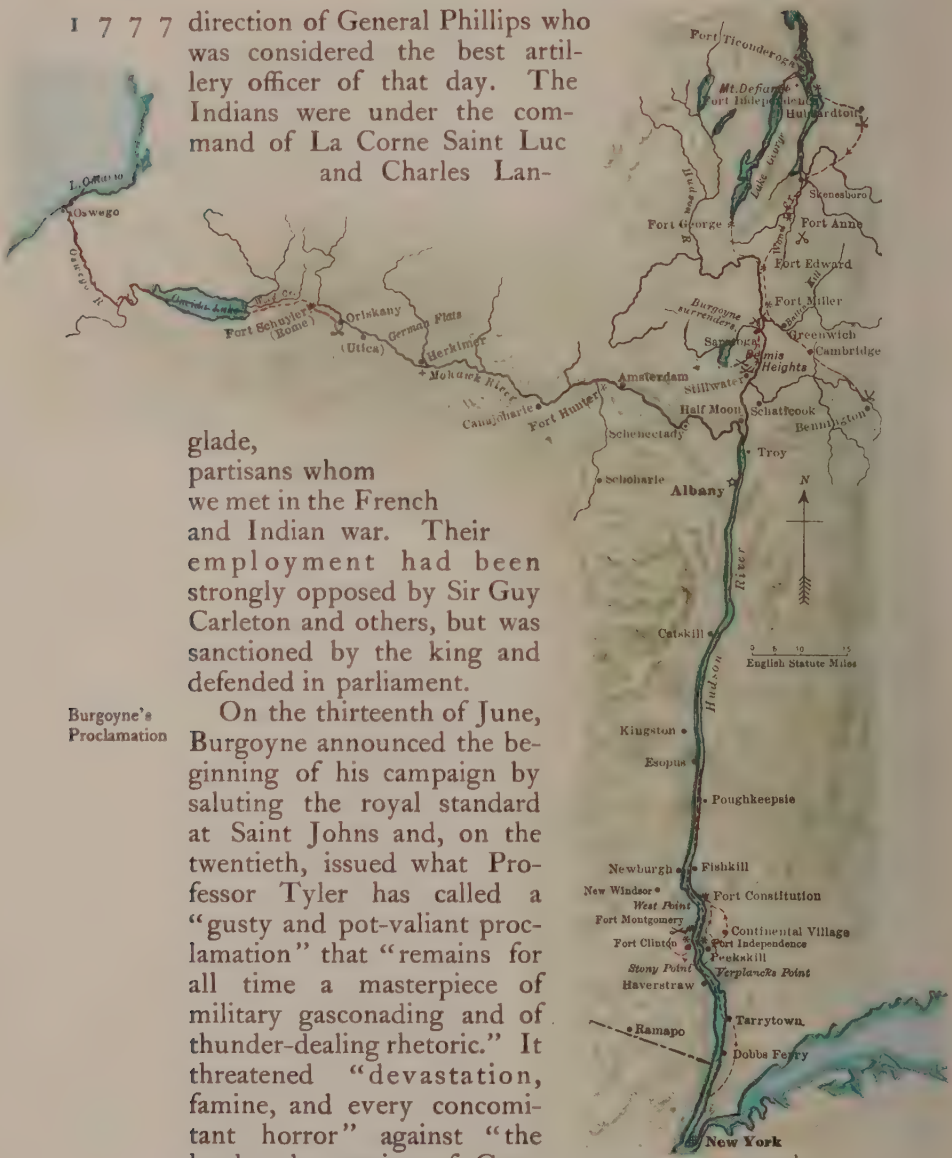

We have seen that Sir William Howe contributed nothing to the close coöperation that was necessary for the success of this plan. The reader of this chapter will do well to keep clearly in mind Howe's successive movements as recorded in the third chapter. But there were other difficulties and dangers that clung close to Burgoyne's line of march from Canada, such as poor roads, long distances, and the proximity of New England territory, where thousands who were unwilling or unable to join the regular army would promptly answer a call for a few weeks' military service not far from home. Moreover, the triple plan transgressed one of the primary principles of military strategy, namely, that a force operating upon interior lines has a great advantage over a force operating in scattered detachments and upon exterior lines. As the campaign advanced, it was found that every suggestion for a modification of the original plan had to be sent by ocean and river over fifteen hundred miles; that, even when they were not intercepted, dispatches between Howe and Burgoyne took nearly three months to go and come; and that neither general could communicate at all with Saint Leger in the depths of a wilderness fifty leagues from New York or Montreal. As might have been foreseen, each of the three British commands was compelled to act independently without hope or possibility of much aid from either of the others. On the other hand, news of what was taking place in the northern country might be sent directly and thus quickly to Washington who, operating on interior lines, could send reinforcements from his camp in New Jersey by four easy marches to Putnam at the highlands of the Hudson or march his whole army to Lake George within a fortnight. As a matter of fact, some of the American regulars fought against Burgoyne at Saratoga and then joined Washington in time to take part in his campaign in the central provinces, while the single season saw Benedict Arnold driving Tryon from Connecticut, facing Saint Leger on the Mohawk, and fighting furiously at Saratoga. 1777

Burgoyne's Army

Burgoyne, who enjoyed the favor of both king and ministry, had stipulated for a strong veteran force officered by men of experience and skill. By the first of July, he had an army of almost eight thousand, nearly half of whom were Hessians; he also had about two hundred and fifty Canadians and provincials and about four hundred Indians; his artillery train was said to be the finest in America and was under the immediate 1777 direction of General Phillips who was considered the best artillery officer of that day. The Indians were under the command of La Corne Saint Luc and Charles Langlade, partisans whom we met in the French and Indian war. Their employment had been strongly opposed by Sir Guy Carleton and others, but was sanctioned by the king and defended in parliament.

General Theatre of Burgoyne's Campaign of 1777

Burgoyne's Proclamation

On the thirteenth of June, Burgoyne announced the beginning of his campaign by saluting the royal standard at Saint Johns and, on the twentieth, issued what Professor Tyler has called a "gusty and pot-valiant proclamation" that "remains for all time a masterpiece of military gasconading and of thunder-dealing rhetoric." It threatened "devastation, famine, and every concomitant horror" against "the hardened enemies of Great Britain and America" and made significant allusion to "the Indian forces under my direction." The grandiloquent attempt to frighten or allure the country people was travestied in verse by Governor Livingston and burlesqued in a counter-proclamation by Francis Hopkinson. The burlesque was everywhere read amid roars of laughter, a safe antidote to a popular panic. 1777

Autograph of Phillips

Burgoyne's Indian Harangue

Burgoyne then gave a war-feast to his Indian allies, urged them not to massacre the children, women, and old men, and prescribed the conditions on which they might take the scalps of those they killed in battle. In the British house of commons, Burke exclaimed: "Suppose there was a riot on Tower Hill. What would the keeper of his Majesty's lions do? Would he not fling open the dens of the wild beasts, and then address them thus: 'My gentle lions — my humane bears — my tender-hearted hyenas, go forth! But I exhort you, as you are Christians and members of civil society, to take care not to harm any man, woman, or child.'"

Canteen of the Revolutionary Period

The Investment of Ticonderoga

On the twenty-seventh of June, Burgoyne reached Crown Point; on the thirtieth, he announced that "this army must not retreat;" on the first of July, he began the investment of Ticonderoga, then held by Major-general Saint Clair and about three thousand. On the other side of the narrowed Lake Champlain, the Americans had fortified Mount Independence; between the two strong-

1777 holds were a floating bridge and a boom. Saint Clair had failed to occupy Sugar Loaf Mountain on the peninsula

Caricature on the Employment of Indians in the War by the British (Published in London, 1780)

between the two lakes; this mountain overlooked both American positions, but was generally supposed to be inaccessible to artillery. The British quickly saw their opportunity. Burgoyne's engineers carefully explored the mountain and undertook to make a road by which General Phillips could bring up 24-pounders and 8-inch howitzers with which to garnish the peak. General William Phillips of the Royal Artillery was a veteran whose "exploits in war were marked by striking originality of conception and vivacious daring in execution." A day and a night were spent in fierce labor and, on the morning of the fifth, Saint Clair and his men were surprised to see Fort Defiance on the Sugar Loaf and threatening a fire that they could not return and that they could not endure for an hour. The Americans had to evacuate the fort to save the garrison.

Under cover of night, the women and the wounded with what guns and stores could be saved were put on two hundred bateaux and, escorted by five armed galleys, the remnant of Arnold's squadron, under command of Colonel Long, set out for Skenesboro, now Whitehall. Saint Clair and the garrison crossed the floating bridge to Mount Independence and thence retreated toward Castleton in the Green Mountains. Contrary to orders, some one set fire to a house and the flames disclosed the American retreat to the enemy who immediately occupied the deserted forts and prepared for pursuit. General Fraser was on the march by daylight and Riedesel followed not long after. Burgoyne and Phillips broke through the boom and bridge and began the chase of the American flotilla.

1777 The Evacuation of Ticonderoga

Map of the Investment of Fort Ticonderoga

On his retreat through the woods, Saint Clair left Colonel Warner and twelve hundred men at Hubbardton; with the others he pushed on to Castleton. On the morning of the seventh, Fraser and eight hundred

The Affair at Hubbardton

1777 British regulars attacked Warner and a sharp engagement followed. Hale's regiment of New Hampshire militia fled from the field, Riedesel's Hessians

Soldiers' Belt Buckles (Brass, Silver, and Copper) found in Camp at Fort Ticonderoga (Reproduced directly from the originals kindly loaned by Mr. Silas H. Paine) arrived opportunely, and Warner was forced to retreat to Rutland with a loss of forty killed and more than two hundred wounded and taken captive. The subsequent capture of Colonel Hale and his fugitive militia raised the American loss to more than three hundred. With the remnant of his command, Saint Clair made a circuitous march of more than a hundred miles and arrived at Fort Edward on the twelfth.

Colonel Long and the American Flotilla

Map of the Battle of Hubbardton

On the seventh, the British fleet overtook the fugitive flotilla at the wharves at Skenesboro. Two of the galleys surrendered, the rest were blown up by their crews; bateaux, mills, storehouses, and stockade were burned; according to the official report to General Schuyler, "not one earthly thing was saved." Colonel Long and his detachment fled by land toward Fort Anne, pursued by the ninth regiment of British foot under Lieutenant-colonel John Hill. On the eighth, there was a sharp engagement in which Colonel Long's ammunition gave out. In consequence of this, Fort Anne was burned and Long then retreated to Fort Edward where he joined General Schuyler. In his Journal, Lieutenant Digby says: "At that action, the 9th took their colours, which were intended as a present to their Colonel Lord Ligonier.

They were very handsome, a flag of the United States, 13 stripes alternate red and white [with thirteen stars], in a blue field representing a new constellation." If we could accept this entry as correct, it would establish the eighth of July, 1777, as the date of the first flying of the stars and stripes in battle. But it appears that news of the enactment of the flag statute of the fourteenth of June was not received at Albany until the thirty-first of July and it seems

1 7 7 7
July 8

Cartridge Box used during the Revolution
(From collection of Mr. Harry A. Ogden)

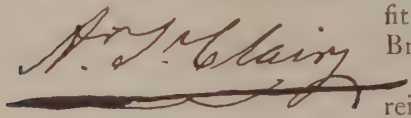

Two Flags of the Second New Hampshire Regiment taken by the British at Fort Anne (Now in possession of Colonel George W. Rogers, of Wykeham, Burgess Hill, Sussex, to whom we are indebted for permission to reproduce these, and through whose kind assistance we obtained colored photographs from which the above were engraved)

1777 impossible that such colors could have been carried in the woods still further north several weeks before that date. I feel very certain that the only American flags taken at Fort Anne were those of the second New Hampshire regiment; these are still in existence and do not at all resemble the then recently authorized starry banner. Digby's Journal, in its present form, was written from memory after the campaign was over and the entry in question is undoubtedly erroneous.

Fort Edward Abandoned

For more than a week after Saint Clair's arrival, there were at Fort Edward only about forty-four hundred men fit for duty; flushed with success, the British were not more than a day's march distant. Schuyler called for reinforcements and put forth herculean efforts to oppose the further advance of the enemy. Wood Creek was obstructed, roads were broken up, bridges were destroyed, and the country was stripped of cattle and supplies. Schuyler then abandoned Fort Edward and fell back across the Hudson to Stillwater and finally placed his army in an intrenched camp on Van Schaick's Island where the Mohawk empties into the Hudson.

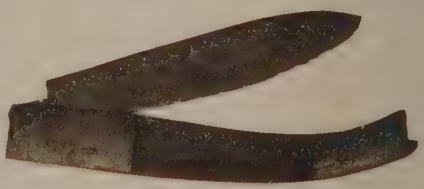

Autograph of Arthur Saint Clair

July 30

A Blessing in Disguise

In England, Burgoyne's success was accepted as the death-blow to the American cause, and George III. was so excited that he rushed into the queen's apartments clapping his hands and shouting in glee, "I have beat them!" In America, the loss of the fortress created wide-spread despondency. Washington wrote: "The evacuation of Ticonderoga and Mount Independence is an Event of Chagrin and surprise, not apprehended nor within the compass of my reasoning." Schuyler and Saint Clair were bitterly blamed for the disaster, and "We shall never be able to defend a post till we have shot a general," exclaimed John Adams. The conduct of both officers was later vindicated by courts martial, and Thatcher recorded a prediction "that this event, apparently so calamitous, will ultimately prove advantageous by drawing the British army into the heart of our country and thereby placing them more immediately in our power." This has been called "a blind trusting in Providence without regard to the condition of the powder," but there runs through it a warp of worldly wisdom, and Providence justified the faith. 1777 July 14

Soldier's Pocket-knife found near Fort Ticonderoga
(Reduced reproduction made directly from the original which was kindly loaned to us by Mr. Silas H. Paine)

The Beginning of Burgoyne's Difficulties

On the ground that his jurisdiction did not extend beyond the borders of Canada, Governor Carleton declined to forward troops for garrisoning the captured forts and Burgoyne was forced "to drain the life-blood of his army" for that purpose. He left his surplus artillery at Ticonderoga and forwarded the rest, with necessary stores, by way of Lake George, whence ran the direct road to Albany. Instead of returning with his army to Ticonderoga and taking the same water route, he made the mistake of forcing his way through the wilderness from Fort Anne to Fort Edward, building more than forty bridges on the way. The midsummer heat was intense, the insects were pestiferous; twenty-six miles in twenty-four days. "Burgoyne had been accustomed to explain how he would isolate the Eastern colonies from the rest of the Confederacy by patrolling the chain of lakes and rivers with his gunboats, and scouring the roads with his flying columns. But technical phrases which carried cheerful conviction across a dinner-table in Mayfair did not sound as if they covered the whole of the military situation when repeated in the heart of the American jungle." The delay worked to the advantage of the Americans. And where was Howe?

One of the Axes used by Burgoyne's Troops in cutting down Trees on their Retreat from Ticonderoga, found at Schuylerville, New York
(Reduced reproduction made directly from the original which was kindly loaned to us by Mr. Silas H. Paine)

Jane McCrea, young, beautiful, and of 1777 high social standing, was soon to have been married

The Killing of Jane McCrea to a loyalist lieutenant in Burgoyne's army. On the twenty-seventh of July, while visiting at a house near Fort Edward, she was seized and carried off by a party of Indians led by a sachem known as the Wyandot Panther. While in captivity, Miss McCrea was killed; just how, is uncertain. The next day, the "Panther" came into the British camp with a fresh scalp that was recognized as that of Miss McCrea. The story, highly colored and often told, roused general indignation and led many loyalists away from the cause of the king. Then the rule was made that no Indians should go on an expedition unless accompanied by a British officer; this made the Indians angry and, when the fortune of war began to turn, many of them deserted. But they had already done irreparable harm to the royal cause. The reports of their excesses were carried far and wide, as was sped the fiery cross of Highland story:

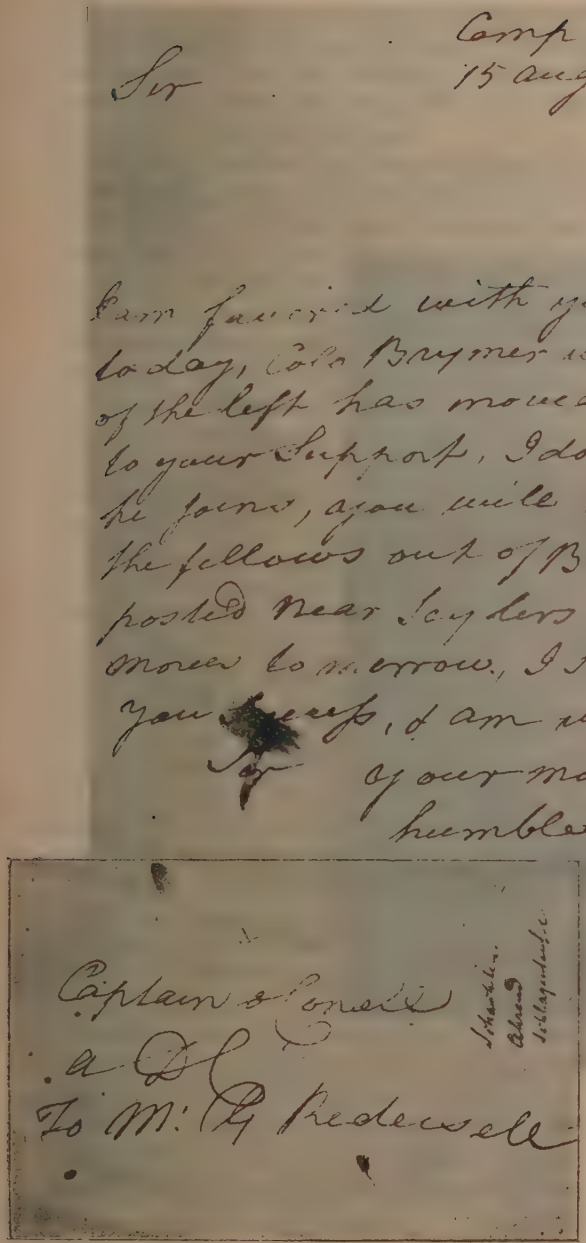

Uniform of a Brunswick Dragoon (dismounted) of Lieutenant-colonel Baum's Regiment (Drawn by Mr. Harry A. Ogden)

> In arms the huts and hamlets rise;
> From winding glen and upland brown,
> They pour'd each hardy tenant down.

On the Road to Bennington

As Burgoyne found it difficult to supply his troops with bread, he adopted a plan that was recommended to him by Major Philip Skene for whom Skenesboro had been named. Lieutenant-colonel Friedrich Baum was sent with about five hundred and August 11 fifty men, a hundred Indians, and two pieces of artillery to seize the American depot at Bennington. That the loyalists who were said to be swarming in the region might be quickly organized, Major Skene and other

Sir

Camp at Saratoga
15 august 1777

I am favord with your Letter dated to day, Colo Breyman with the Reserve of the left has moved up this morning to your Support, I do not doubt, when he joins, you will be able to drive the fellows out of Bemington, I am posted near Snyders house, the army moves to morrow, I sincerely wish you success, & am with much Esteem
Sr your most obedt humble Servant
Sim: Fraser
B: General

Captain Genl
a D.C.
To M: G Riedesel

GENERAL SIMON FRASER'S LETTER TO BARON RIEDESEL
(From original in the New York Public Library, Emmet Collection)

loyalist officers were sent along to command the expected accessions. On the fifteenth, Colonel Breyman, with about five hundred men and two pieces of artillery, was sent to Baum's support. 1777

Stark was there and Warner Came

Feeling that he had been wronged in the matter of promotion, John Stark had returned to his New Hampshire home. When New Hampshire flew to arms, Stark accepted the command of the militia and, on the day that Baum appeared, had about fourteen hundred men at Bennington. On the fifteenth, Baum occupied a strong position about six miles from Bennington; there was some skirmishing, but rain prevented a general engagement. On the sixteenth, Stark led his men to the assault, saying, according to tradition: "There they are, boys, we beat them to-day or Molly Stark's a widow!" 'Tis a good story, although Mrs. Stark's name was Elizabeth. Stark attacked the enemy on three sides, stormed their intrenchments, captured their guns, dispersed the Indians, and was in hot pursuit of the allies when his exhausted forces were checked by Breyman's detachment. But Colonel Seth Warner also arrived with his Green Mountain Boys whose ranks had been

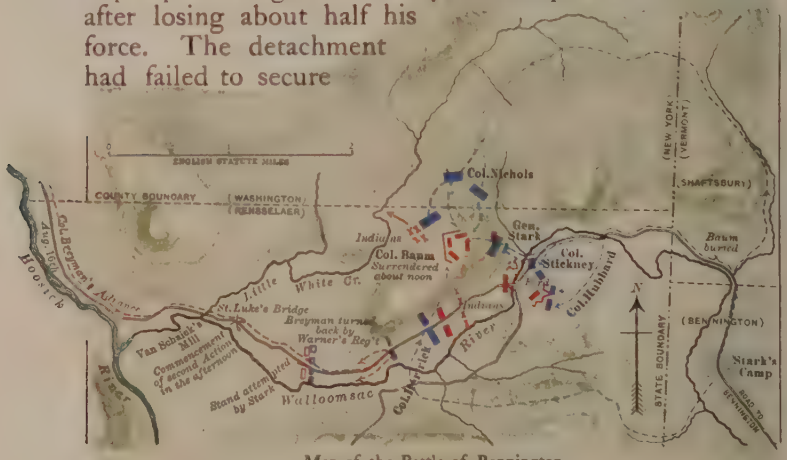

General John Stark

Map of the Mohawk-Oneida

1777 sadly thinned at Hubbardton; the action was renewed and kept up until night when Breyman escaped in the darkness after losing about half his force. The detachment had failed to secure the horses, wagons, cattle, and provisions that were needed and had lost all of its artillery, most of its baggage, and several hundred small arms. There was no longer any possibility of Burgoyne's making a sudden and successful dash to Albany. The American loss was about forty killed and about as many wounded. Baum was mortally wounded and died two days later. According to his declaration, the

Map of the Battle of Bennington

ROUTE AND SETTLEMENTS, 1772

provincials "fought more like hell-hounds than soldiers." 1777
Stark received the thanks of congress and was made a brigadier-general. With open pride, an English historian proclaims that "it was an Englishman's victory. A force of drilled and pipe-clayed foreigners, intruding where they were not wanted, had been put to the rout by English farmers, fighting in civilian costume and with native courage to defend the inviolability of their English homes."

Joseph Brant

Saint Leger's Advance

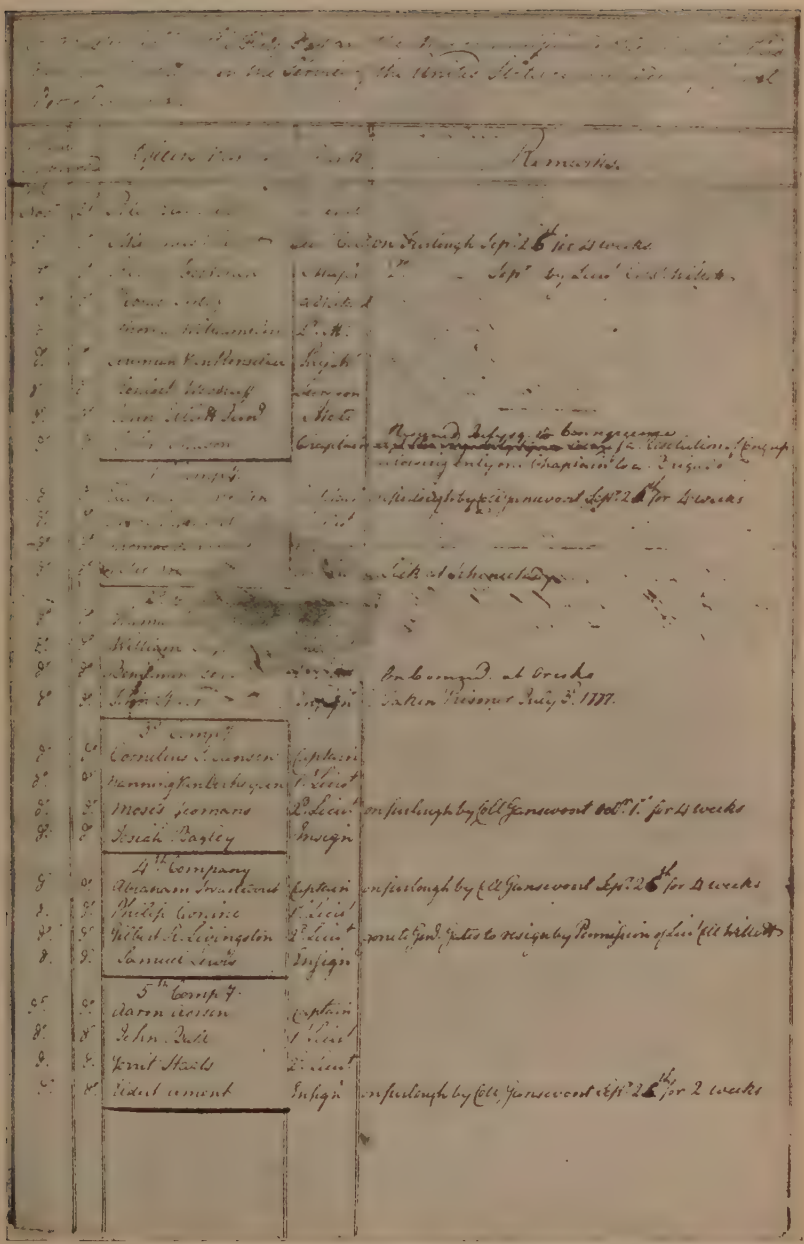

In the latter half of July, Major Barry Saint Leger, the acting brigadier-general who had gone up the Saint Lawrence to Lake Ontario, landed at Oswego preparatory to his proposed advance upon Albany. He found the Iroquois divided, but obtained the assistance of several hundred warriors led by the chieftain, Thayendanegea, better

1777 known as Joseph Brant. With these Indians and a force of British regulars, a company of Hanau chasseurs, Colonel John Butler's company of Tory rangers, and Sir John Johnson's Tory regiment of "Royal Greens," Saint Leger moved forward to the Great Carrying Place. On the second of August, his advanced guard of about thirty men, under Lieutenant Bird, and some of his Indian allies appeared before Fort Schuyler, formerly Fort Stanwix. The fort was defended by five or six hundred men under Colonel Peter Gansevoort, with Lieutenant-colonel Marinus Willett second in

Autograph of John Butler

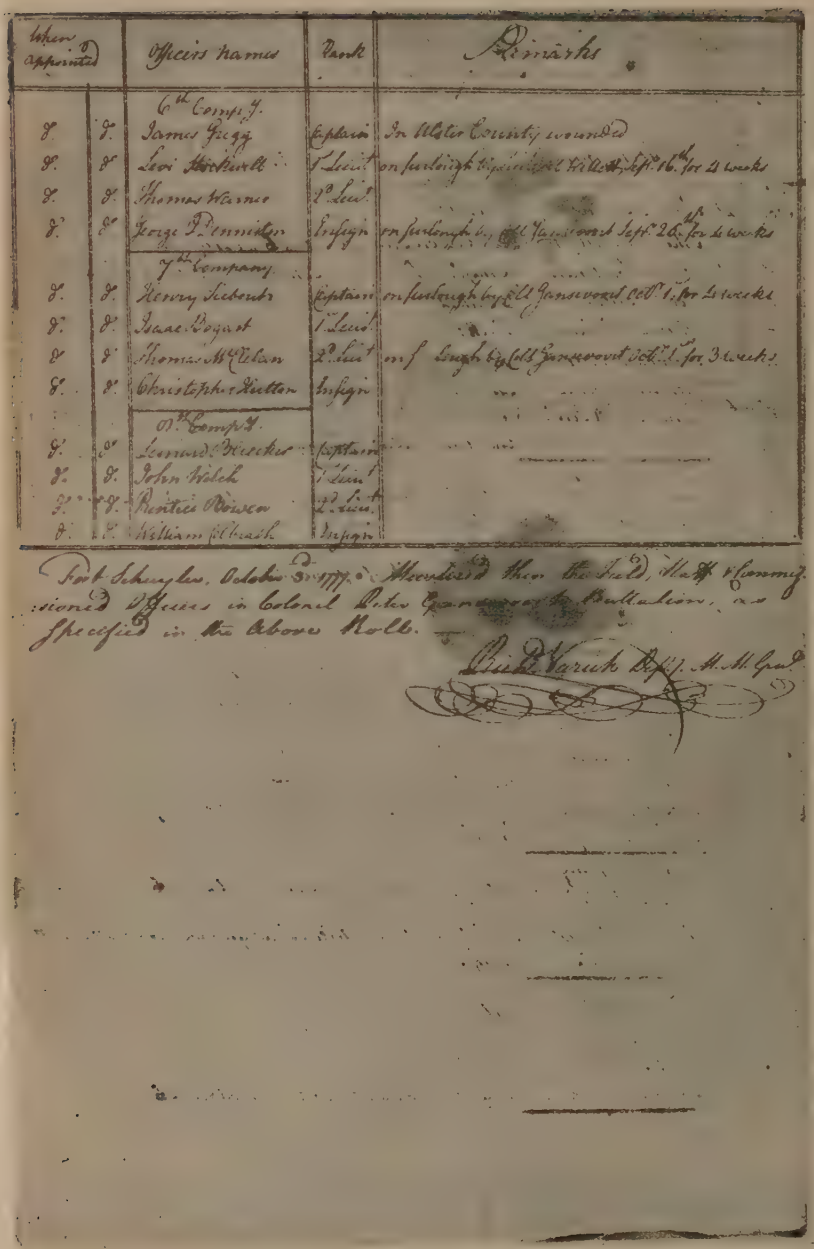

Diagram representing the Order of March of Saint Leger's Troops
(Reduced facsimile of original colored drawing, now in possession of Mrs. Catherine Gansevoort Lansing. It had been found in the writing-desk of Saint Leger, which he left behind when he fled from his camp before Fort Schuyler)

MUSTER-ROLL OF COLONEL PETER GAN

(From the Gansevoort Papers in possessio

When appointed | Officers names | Rank | Remarks

When appointed		Officers names	Rank	Remarks
		6th Comp.y
8.	9.	James Gregg	Captain	In Ulster County wounded
8.	9.	Levi Hicks	1st Lieut.	on furlough by Col. Willett Sept. 16th for 2 weeks
8.	9.	Thomas Warner	2d Lieut.
8.	9.	Jorge P. Denniston	Ensign	on furlough by Col. Gansevoort Sept. 26th for 2 weeks
		7th Company
8.	9.	Henry Siebert	Captain	on furlough by Col. Gansevoort Oct. 1. for 2 weeks
8.	9.	Isaac Bogart	1st Lieut.
8.	9.	Thomas McClean	2d Lieut.	on furlough by Col. Gansevoort Oct. 1. for 3 weeks
8.	9.	Christopher Hutton	Ensign
		8th Comp.y
8.	9.	Leonard Wessels	Captain
8.	9.	John Welch	1st Lieut.
8.	9.	Peartree Bowen	2d Lieut.
8.	9.	William Gilbreath	Ensign

Fort Schuyler, October 3d 1777. Mustered this the 2nd, Mast. Commissioned Officers in Colonel Peter Gansevoort's Battalion, as Specified in the above Rolls.

Richd. Varick Dep.y M. M. Gen.l

SEVOORT'S STAFF AND OTHER OFFICERS

1 of Mrs. Catherine Gansevoort Lansing) command. In the afternoon of that day, the fort was reinforced by Lieutenant-colonel Mellon and about two hundred men of the ninth Massachusetts regiment; their arrival made the total number of the defenders of the fort about seven hundred and fifty. Mellon and his men had come up the Mohawk from Albany bringing sadly needed ammunition and supplies. In the forenoon of the following day, Saint Leger arrived with the main body of his troops. 1777

Peter Gansevoort

(Reproduced from the original painting in possession of Mrs. Catherine Gansevoort Lansing)

Sunday, August 3

The Stars and Stripes First Face the Foe

Mellon's men had brought from Albany to Fort Schuyler newspaper accounts of the newly enacted flag statute and, on the morning after their arrival, the fort was ransacked for needed material and a standard was improvised for the occasion, with alternate stripes (so runs the legend) from a soldier's white shirt and a camp-woman's red petticoat, and with a field cut from Captain Abraham Swartwout's blue cloth cloak. Recently discovered journals set forth in considerable detail that the flag was made in the forenoon of Sunday and that, in the afternoon, a flagstaff was raised on the northeast bastion, the one nearest Saint Leger's camp, the flag was run up, and guns were fired at the enemy. Then the drummer beat the assembly and the adjutant read to the congregated men the congressional resolution "particularizing the insignia of the flag of the New Republic."

1777 It is to be regretted that this ensign, rude in construction though it doubtless was, is probably no longer in existence.

Herkimer at Oriskany

August 5

With about eight hundred men, Nicholas Herkimer, a tough and stout-hearted patriarch and the commander of the militia of Tryon County, advanced to Oriskany, eight miles from the beleaguered fort, and, in the even-

Dear Sir/

The great distance which Your duty calls us Apart obliges me at this time to give You this trouble which Otherwise I would not — You may Remember Agreable to Your promise I was to have an Order for Eight Yards of Broad Cloath, on the Commissary for Cloathing of this State, In lieu of my Blue Cloak, which was Used for Coulours at Fort Schuyler — an Opportunity Now presenting itself - I beg You to send me an Order, inclosed to Mr Jeremiah Ronsselaer, pay Master at Albany — to Mr Henry Van Vaughter, Albany, where I will receive it, and You will Oblige me, who will Always acknowledge the same with true gratitude - — —

Please to make my Compts to the Other Officers of the Regiment

I am Dear Sir/

Your Hble Servt

Poughkeepsie — 29th Aug 1778 } Abraham Swartwout Ensn

Colonel Peter Gansivoorth — Fort Schuyler

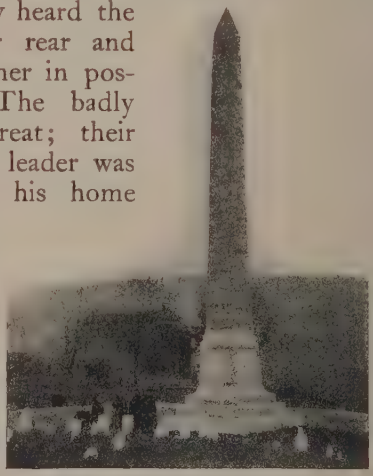

Abraham Swartwout's Letter to Peter Gansevoort requesting an Order for Cloth which had been promised him for his Blue Cloak

(From original in possession of Mrs. Catherine Gansevoort Lansing)

DIAGRAM OF FORT STANWIX (SCHUYLER)
(Facsimile of contemporary drawing in possession of Mrs. Catherine Gansevoort Lansing)

1777 ing, sent messengers to the fort to arrange for a concerted attack on the besiegers. Gansevoort was to fire three signal-guns, Herkimer was to advance against the enemy, and the garrison was to sally out upon them. But the messengers were longer in reaching the fort than had been expected and Herkimer's impatient men taunted their general into leading them forward. As the militia were hastily advancing through a wooded ravine, the ambushed Indians on either side and the British and Tories at the further end opened fire. Herkimer's rear guard was cut off; the supply train and many prisoners were captured. With his horse killed and his leg shattered, Herkimer sat on his saddle with his back against a great beech-tree, calmly smoked his pipe, and shouted his orders. A heavy thunderstorm checked the battle for a time, after which the contest was renewed with a vindictiveness unsurpassed in the annals of this war. After a long and obstinate fight, much of it hand to hand, the enemy heard the sound of guns in their rear and withdrew, leaving Herkimer in possession of the field. The badly crippled force had to retreat; their brave but inexperienced leader was carried on a litter to his home where he died ten days later, "calmly smoking his Dutch pipe, and reading his Bible at the thirty-eighth Psalm." After a delay of not much more than a century, congress voted him a monument.

Herkimer Monument at Oriskany

Autograph of Nicholas Herkimer

August 6

Robbing the Red Men

After the passing of the storm that checked the battle, Lieutenant-colonel Willett, with two hundred and fifty men and a three-pound carronade, sallied from the fort, attacked the almost unprotected camp of Sir John Johnson, and, without the loss of a man, captured a few prisoners, a large quantity of guns and ammunition, Indian weapons and blankets, Johnson's papers and baggage, and nearly all the records of the expedition. 1777

Map of the Siege of Fort Schuyler

The Indians had gone out to fight nearly naked; when they came back to camp, they found that their clothing and blankets had been taken.

Schuyler Sends Relief

Saint Leger continued the siege. One dark night, Lieutenant-colonel Willett and Lieutenant Stockwell crept stealthily from the fort and hastened to Fort Dayton at German Flats, whence Willett went to Albany seeking assistance. But Schuyler had already taken steps to relieve the fort and put an end to the discussions and insinuations of the council called to consider the subject by this declaration: "Gentlemen, I shall take the responsibility upon myself. Where is the brigadier that will take command of the

Monument to Marinus Willett at Albany

(Inscription reads: "In grateful memory of COLONEL MARINUS WILLETT — 1740-1830 — for his gallant and patriotic services in defense of Albany and the people of the Mohawk Valley against Tory and Indian foes during the years of the war for independence, this stone, brought from the scenes of conflict and typical of his rugged character has been placed here under the auspices of the Sons of the Revolution in the state of New York, by the Philip Livingston Chapter of Albany, A. D. 1907.")

1777 relief? I shall beat for volunteers tomorrow." The brigadiers sat silent, but General Arnold, whom Washington had sent to the northern army, volunteered to lead the expedition. A week later, Arnold and his men were at German Flats.

Old Church at German Flats, erected in 1767 near Fort Herkimer

Among the prisoners was a half-witted Tory under sentence of death. As the price of his life, Yon-Yost agreed to carry to the enemy an exaggerated report of Arnold's strength. He had several bullets fired through his coat and then, leaving his brother as a hostage, set out for Saint Leger's camp where he soon appeared almost breathless, told his story, and pointed to the bullet-holes to show how narrow had been his escape. When questioned as to the number of Arnold's force, then less than thirty miles away, he pointed to the forest leaves and shook his head mysteriously; within twenty-four hours Arnold would be there with two thousand men. Just then an Oneida Indian from Arnold's camp arrived with a confirmatory report. The Indians, thoroughly alarmed, took their departure. On the following day, Saint Leger abandoned his trenches, camp equipage, and some artillery and fled with his white troops to Oswego and thence to Montreal. The Iroquois plundered their late allies, killed some, and, according to Saint Leger, "became more formidable than the enemy." Howe and Burgoyne might meet at Albany as previously planned, but Saint Leger had been "wiped out of the campaign." 1777

Arnold's Successful Stratagem

Gansevoort's Statue at Rome, New York

August 23

A Hedge of Trouble

In Burgoyne's camp, the news of Saint Leger's flight followed hard upon the heels of the fugitives from Bennington; supplies were failing, the only news from Howe was "that his intentions were for Pennsylvania," and the loyalists had not risen as expected. The appeals of Washington and Schuyler, the story of Jane McCrea, and Tryon's vindictive burning of Danbury roused New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York to patriotic fervor, put their able-bodied sons on the road to Albany, and even melted the pewter of their sideboards into bullets for the use of the troops on the Hudson. The spirit of the hour is well illustrated by the letter that, on the fourth of August, the town of Litchfield sent in reply to the appeal made by the committeemen of Albany County to the sympathies of Connecticut:

Soldier's Pewter Spoon found near Fort Edward (Direct reproduction by courtesy of Mr. Silas H. Paine)

Yours of the First Instant, respecting the alarming Situation of our northern affairs never reached us before this moment. Surely, Gentlemen, we shall never be backward in affording every Possible aid in our power for the Relief of the County of Albany. We are not so narrow and Contracted as not to extend every assistance as well to the Inhabatents of a sister state as to those of our own; nor do we imagine that we our selfs can long be safe whilst Desolation and Conquest over spread your State. In short our Feelings are such that we would run every Hazzard, and risque every danger, for you that we should for ourselves.

There was no time to correct the spelling—and who shall say it needs correction? On the twentieth of August, Burgoyne wrote to Lord Germain: "The great bulk of the country is undoubtedly with the Congress in principle and zeal, and their measures are executed with a secrecy and dispatch that are not to be equaled."

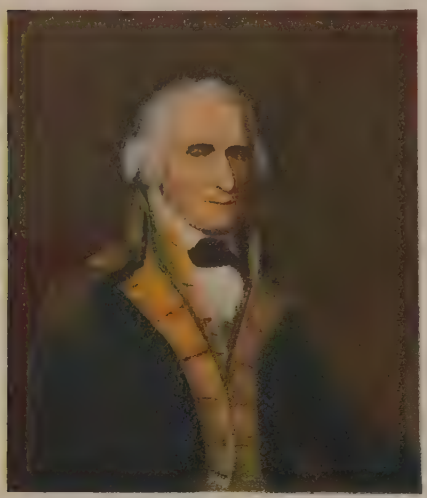

Three weeks had wrought a marvelous change in the moral and material strength of the opposing forces.

The Rally of the Rebels

1777 General Benjamin Lincoln, who had been sent by Schuyler into New England to raise troops, was hovering in Burgoyne's rear eager to pounce with his two thousand men upon Ticonderoga; Stark, now a major-general, sent word that he was on his way with the surviving heroes of Bennington; smaller bands of well-armed patriots were busy with Burgoyne's communications; a few days more and Arnold would be back from the Mohawk with his eight hundred jubilant volunteers and reinforcements from the Tryon County militia. The army in Burgoyne's front had already been strengthened by thousands of volunteers and by Nixon's and Glover's brigades and Morgan's Virginia riflemen that Washington had sent from his own insufficient force. Schuyler had fairly retrieved his reputation and held the confidence of the ten thousand men whom he could put in line when the shock of battle came.

Gates Supersedes Schuyler

Even the fathers of the republic had their jealousies and rivalries that did much to lessen the effectiveness of the army. Congress made generals at its will and replaced them at its pleasure, and sometimes was controlled by party spirit and sectional jealousy rather than by merit. We have seen how Arnold and Stark had thus been wronged, but nowhere else were the mischievous effects of political "pull" as vividly portrayed as in the command of the northern department. Wooster, Thomas, Sullivan, Schuyler, and Gates had come and gone in quick succession, leaving Schuyler in command

General Horatio Gates

by reinstatement in the fall of 1776. Aided by New England prejudice and the loss of Ticonderoga, Gates now secured the command of the northern army, just in time to catch the fruit then ripened and ready to fall. Schuyler received the order superseding him on the tenth of August, but, with a soldierly patriotism that did him high honor, labored with unceasing vigor to strengthen the army until Gates arrived on the nineteenth. 1777 August 2

On the sixth of September, Gates issued orders to "have everything necessary in immediate readiness for a march," explaining (according to the copy made by William Torrey, adjutant of Colonel John Bailey's regiment, Learned's brigade) that "to drive the Enemy with disgrace and defeat back to Canada is the Object of the Present Campaign. What has been So Successfully begun under Genl Stark and Colo Warner to the Eastward, and by Genl Herkemer and Colo Gansewort to the Westward, Cannot with the Blessing of Heaven fail to be equally Prosperous in the hands of the Generals and Soldiers Pointed to face the Enemy's Main Army at the Northward. If the Murder of Aged Parents and their Innocent Children, if Mangling the Blooming Virgins and Inoffensive youths be Incitements of Revenge, if the Righteous Cause of Freedom, the happiness of Prosperity, be Motives to Stimulate the Army and Conquer the Mercenary and Merciless Foes; the time is now come when they are called upon by their Country, by their Genl, by every Person human and divine, to Vanquish their Enemies." Preparing to Push Things

After nearly three weeks of delay, Gates moved his camp from Van Schaick's Island to Bemis Heights, directly in Burgoyne's way to Albany. There he took up an easily defensible position, chosen by Arnold and fortified by Kosciusko. On the eleventh, from his headquarters at Stillwater, he expressed his astonishment "at the shocking Complaints, made by many of the Inhabitants, of the infamous Plundering and depredations committed, in direct violation of the Orders of the 2d of August, by Marauders from this Army since his arrival Both Armies Advance Toward Bemis Heights September 8

1777 on this ground. To Multiply the Calamities of our unfortunate countrymen, . . . to Plunder and Rob them of the little they have left, Reflects dishonor on our Arms and human nature; the first person convicted of Marauding must expect to suffer death." Two days
September 13 later, in similar manner, he announced that "The Enemy, defeated and disgraced at Bennington, disappointed and Vexed at the unprosperous State of their Affairs, may try, by one Rash Stroke to Recover what they have lost; and like desperate Gamesters Hazzard all at one throw; to defeat them, is to finish the war in this department. Great Honour and Renown will be given to this Army, should they, by the blessing of divine Providence, atcheive so glorious a Victory as the overthrow of the Enemy would be." Burgoyne, having received artillery and thirty days' provisions from Lake George, moved south-
September 13 ward from Fort Edward and, by a bridge of boats, crossed to the west bank of the Hudson. By the morning of the nineteenth, he was reconnoitering and preparing to attack Gates at Bemis Heights. Parallel to his line of march, a fleet of barges bore down the Hudson, baggage, ordnance stores, and a month's supply of food.

The American Position

Between the two armies was a table land bounded by the Hudson on the east, skirted by hills on the three other sides, and cut by ravines worn by the branches of Mill Creek. Back of a narrow cultivated strip along the river was a dense forest. The Americans were intrenched on the heights south of the middle ravine. The right wing, under Gates in person, occupied the intrenchments between the hill and the Hudson, General Ebenezer Learned held the center, and Arnold the left. The total strength of the American army was about nine thousand.

Burgoyne's Advance

About eleven o'clock on the nineteenth of September, Burgoyne's army advanced to the attack. Phillips and Riedesel, with the heavy artillery and the left column, took the main road along the Hudson. The central column, led by Burgoyne in person, moved towards Freeman's farm, well toward the American left. The right column, under General Fraser and composed of German riflemen, Canadians, loyalists, and Indians, took a circuitous route further west, thus greatly overlapping the Ameri- 1777

Map of the Battle of Freeman's Farm

can left. According to the scheme of battle, Phillips was to keep Gates in play while Burgoyne and Fraser occupied the high ground westward from the citadel that 1777 Kosciusko had built, to enfilade Gates's lines with cannon, "assail them with the bayonet in flank and rear, and push their ill-commanded and disheartened army into and across the Hudson River." The burden of the battle was to fall on Arnold.

The Battle of Freeman's Farm

Although it was evident that the intention of the enemy was to turn the American left, Gates issued no orders and manifested no disposition to be tempted outside his ramparts. Arnold begged and entreated to be allowed to take the offensive and, when he had secured a grudging permission to do so, sent Morgan's riflemen and some of Dearborn's light infantry to check Fraser's forward movement. In a wilderness of trees and undergrowth in which the Americans were more at home than were the enemy, Fraser's advanced line was driven back. Following this success too eagerly, the Americans came upon the British line of battle, and Morgan's men were repelled in confusion, leaving a captain and twenty men in the hands of the enemy. It is related that Morgan's charge was so headlong that his men got out of hand and were scattered far and wide through the thicket. Almost alone in the woods, Morgan sounded his "turkey call" and thus summoned his men to his side. The forces of Fraser and Burgoyne had been joined so as to present a continuous front when, at about three o'clock, Arnold suddenly fell furiously upon the center of their line in an attempt to cut it. A four hours' struggle followed and all the while the conflict became more terrible. The British guns, the focus of the fighting, were taken and retaken several times. Veterans of the Seven Years' war said that they had never seen such fighting, but Gates, incompetent or culpable, neither sent the reinforcements for which Arnold called nor made any demonstration. 1777

Simon Fraser

"As soon, therefore, as General Phillips became convinced that Gates did not mean fighting, he marched, like a trusty comrade, toward the noise of the cannon," taking artillery and unwounded gunners with him. Rallying the twentieth regiment, he led the veterans forward while a battery of field-pieces played grape at musket range upon the scattered groups of Arnold's weary men. Finally, Riedesel came up with three regiments, and seven companies of the German infantry went into action on the double quick; darkness ended the conflict. The Americans withdrew to their intrenchments and the Anglo-German army retained the field beyond which it had not been able to advance. Both sides claimed the victory; in reality, it was a drawn battle, with British bayonets and artillery matched by American rifles without a single cannon. If Arnold had been properly reinforced, he might have broken the enemy's line and gained a complete victory. The Americans engaged numbered about three thousand. Opposed to them were two or three thousand of the enemy's best troops; the number is not definitely known, but it is very likely that the British were outnumbered. The American loss was somewhat over three hundred; that of the British almost twice as many and several regiments were almost wiped out of existence. The engagement is variously known as the battle of Freeman's Farm, or Stillwater, or the first battle of Bemis Heights.

Gates's Flagrant Injustice

On the twentieth, Arnold thanked the officers and soldiers of his division for their brave and spirited conduct of the day before and acknowledged "the Mercifull Interposition of Heaven in covering our Heads in the day of Battle." Six days later, Gates returned "his Gratefull thanks to Genl Poors and Genl Learneds Brigades, to the Regiment of Riflemen, to the Corps of Light Infantry, and Colo Marshalls Regiment for their Valiant Behaviour in the Action of the 19th Instant." To this, he added that "By the conduct of the Enemy, by their Embarrassed Circumstances, it is evident they must 1777 Endeavour, by one Rash stroke, to Regain all they have lost; that failing, their Utter Ruin is Inevitable." In his report of the battle that he sent to congress, Gates made no more mention of Arnold or of the service that he had rendered than he did in the general orders above cited. "The army, however, rang with praise of the fighting general."

After the Battle

Burgoyne had made arrangements to renew the battle of the nineteenth early in the morning of the twentieth, but, upon reports as to the condition of his troops, countermanded his orders and began a line of elaborate intrenchments from Freeman's farm to the river bank. On the twenty-first, he received Sir Henry Clinton's letter of the twelfth promising a diversion up the Hudson with as many troops as could be withdrawn from the New York garrison—a very different thing from the twenty thousand soldiers with which he had expected Howe to meet him at Albany. For eighteen days following the action of the nineteenth, Burgoyne lay waiting almost passively for Clinton's coming. In this interval came the discouraging news that a part of General

September 18

Lincoln's force had surprised the outposts of Ticonderoga, captured nearly three hundred of the enemy, released many American prisoners, and destroyed more than two hundred gunboats and bateaux. Burgoyne had been effectually cut off from Canada.

Sir Henry Clinton's Expedition up the Hudson July 30

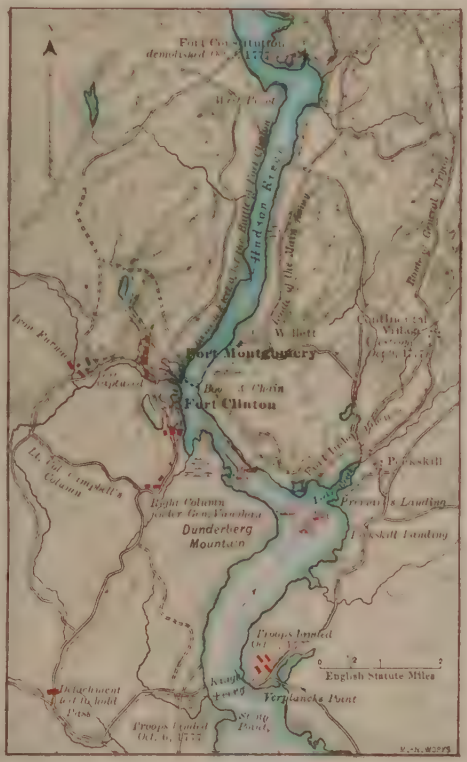

General Howe looked upon his expedition against Philadelphia as a substantial diversion in Burgoyne's favor, as it was; but, when "off the Delaware," he wrote to Sir Henry Clinton at New York suggesting a diversion in favor of General Burgoyne if it could be made with security to Kings Bridge (which Putnam occasionally threatened). On the third of October, Sir Henry Clinton, having been reinforced from England, began an expedition up the Hudson with a large fleet and about three thousand troops. To guard against such a movement, the Americans had fortified the Highlands and placed obstructions in the river. The general command was held by Putnam; Brigadier-general James Clinton of the ATTACK of the FORTS CLINTON & MONTGOMERY, upon HUDSONS RIVER which were Stormed by HIS MAJESTYS Forces under the Command of

PLAN
SIR HENRY CLINTON, K.B
Drawn from the Surveys of VERPLANK HOLLANDS MEARS &c
By JOHN HILLS, L.t 23d Reg.t and Aid.e Encmeer
FORT MONTGOMERY
FORT CLINTON
ANTHONYS NOSE
Fort Independence

FADEN'S MAP OF THE ATTACK ON FORTS CLINTON AND MONTGOMERY
(From copy in colors in collection of the New York Historical Society) with a few regulars and raw militia held Fort Clinton; 1777 his brother George, as governor, adjourned the New York legislature, then at Kingston, and, as a brigadier-general in the continental army, hastened to Fort Montgomery to give his personal support to its feeble garrison. On the fifth, the British forces were at Verplanck Point. By a feint toward Peekskill and favored by a fog, Sir Henry deceived Putnam and was able, on the sixth, to cross the river at Kings Ferry and to carry forts Clinton and Montgomery by assault. General James Clinton received a bayonet wound but escaped to the mountains, and Governor Clinton crossed the Hudson in a skiff and joined General Putnam. The forts were dismantled, the stores destroyed, and the boom and chain across the river broken. The Americans burned two frigates that could not escape and the river was open to the British fleet. As a result of these successes of the enemy, Peekskill and Fort Independence down the river, and Fort Constitution up the river, were abandoned by the Americans, and General Putnam retreated to Fishkill. On the eighth, Sir Henry Clinton

Map of the Attack on Forts Montgomery and Clinton

IN COUNCIL OF SAFETY,

FOR THE

STATE OF NEW-YORK,

JULY 30, 1777,

A Proclamation.

WHEREAS His Excellency GEORGE CLINTON, Esq; has been duly elected Governor of this State of NEW-YORK, and hath this Day qualified himself for the Execution of his Office, by taking in this Council, the Oaths required by the Constitution of this State, to enable him to exercise his said Office; this Council doth therefore, hereby, in the Name and by the Authority of the good People of this State, Proclaim and Declare the said George Clinton, Esq; Governor, General and Commander in Chief of all the Militia, and Admiral of the Navy of this State, to whom the good People of this State are to pay all due Obedience, according to the Laws and Constitution thereof.

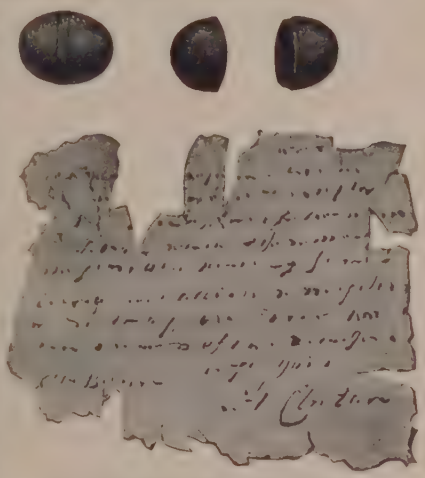

By Order of the Council of Safety,

PIERRE VAN CORTLANDT, President.

KINGSTON: PRINTED BY JOHN HOLT, PRINTER TO THE STATE OF NEW-YORK.

PROCLAMATION BY THE NEW YORK COUNCIL OF SAFETY

wrote to Burgoyne and enclosed the message in a small silver ball. When Clinton's messenger fell into the hands of the Americans, he was seen to swallow something, but an emetic was administered and the ball secured. The British burned Continental Village on the ninth, and a force under General Vaughan pushed on to Kingston and laid the place in ashes. Unaware of Burgoyne's dire need, Clinton returned to New York. Two days later, he went up the river with additional troops but was soon recalled to New York by Howe's demand for reinforcements. The time for "coöperation" had gone by. 1777

The Silver Bullet and Clinton's Message

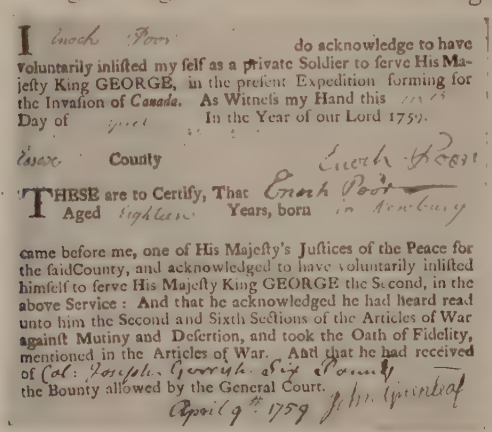

Between Gates and Arnold there was open hostility; the former was envious of the growing fame of his subordinate and resentful of his preference for the deposed Schuyler. A violent quarrel finally took place and, in passion, Arnold asked leave to return to the southern army. Gates gladly granted his request and placed General Lincoln in command of Arnold's division. Arnold quickly repented his action and, having been asked by his indignant officers not to leave them when another battle was impending, lingered at Bemis Heights "as if he were an amateur civilian curious to see what a battle was like." Mr. Fiske says that "Gates took no more notice of him than if he had been a dog." On the seventh of October, Arnold was "like a war horse gnawing his curb and panting for the fray." Arnold's Anger

Burgoyne had been seventy-four days in moving fifty miles from Skenesboro and lost in September what he might have gained in July. Now, his loyalists and Canadians were deserting and his Indians were abandoning him altogether; his enemy was growing stronger every Burgoyne's Reconnaissance 1777 day; he could neither advance nor retreat with safety; to stand still was to starve. Disappointed in not hearing further from Clinton, he resolved to make an armed reconnaissance on the seventh of October; if the prospects were fair, he would attack on the eighth; if they were not, he would fall back behind the Batten Kill. To this end, he left his camp with fifteen hundred regulars and ten pieces of artillery and deployed in line of battle within three-quarters of a mile of the American left which was now under the immediate command of Gates. Riedesel held the British center with Fraser on his right and Phillips on his left. The Indians and provincials were to work through the woods around the American left and to gain the rear of their position.

The Battle of Bemis Heights

Gates promptly sent Morgan and his riflemen to make a wide sweep to the left and to seize the high ground on Fraser's right. Major Dearborn was to advance on Morgan's right. General Poor's brigade was to attack the British left and Learned's brigade was placed in position to follow.

I Enoch Poor do acknowledge to have voluntarily inlisted my self as a private Soldier to serve His Majesty King GEORGE, in the present Expedition forming for the Invasion of Canada. As Witness my Hand this Day of In the Year of our Lord 1759.

Essex County Enoch Poor

THESE are to Certify, That Enoch Poor Aged Eighteen Years, born in Newbury came before me, one of His Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the said County, and acknowledged to have voluntarily inlisted himself to serve His Majesty King GEORGE the Second, in the above Service: And that he acknowledged he had heard read unto him the Second and Sixth Sections of the Articles of War against Mutiny and Desertion, and took the Oath of Fidelity, mentioned in the Articles of War. And that he had received of Col: Joseph Gerrish of Boston the Bounty allowed by the General Court.

April 9th 1759 John Greenleaf

Enlistment Paper signed by Enoch Poor when he joined the Army as a Private in 1759

At half-past two o'clock, Poor attacked Major Acland's grenadiers; Learned gave him good support, and, almost simultaneously, Morgan and Dearborn fell upon the enemy's right. Poor's men played havoc with the grenadiers, killed nearly all of Phillips's gunners, and, turning upon the enemy their own artillery, routed that wing of the British army. Acland had been shot in both legs and, as the grenadiers fell back, they left their brave commander in the hands of the Americans. The German troops in the center gave way, the royal artillery 1777

Lady Harriet Acland

Major Acland

abandoned their guns, and General Fraser endeavored to establish a second line to cover the retreat that had been ordered.

Arnold in Action

At this stage of the battle, Arnold rode madly to the front of Learned's brigade and, pursued by Major Armstrong whom Gates had sent to order him back, dashed into the fight. The men cheered their former commander and went with him like a whirlwind upon the broken British lines. The heroic Fraser fell mortally wounded and brave Burgoyne took command of the line that was now in full retreat. Arnold was no longer master of himself. Wherever he found troops he took command and, "by the magnetism of his will and passion, became supreme in daring endeavor." With a part of the brigades of Patterson and Glover, he assaulted the British intrenchments. On the right of those intrenchments was a covering field-work of horseshoe shape and held by Colonel Breyman and a force of Brunswick infantry. In 1777 front of Freeman's farm was a redoubt with walls a dozen feet in height and flanked by strong intrenchments.

Map of the Battle of Bemis Heights

Behind the walls were heavy guns and stout defenders with Balcarres in command. Against this redoubt, Arnold made his attack but the guns belched forth a shower of grape-shot and the Americans were driven back. 1777

But Arnold, who was in no mood for defeat, hurriedly arranged for an assault on the front and rear of the horseshoe work that the Hessians held. In a single charge, he cleared two stockade redoubts and thus uncovered Breyman's left. Then, with the energy of a madman and the instincts of a soldier, he turned Breyman's position and, in an impetuous onset, carried everything before him. Breyman was killed and those of his men who could not escape laid down their arms in surrender. Just as the last volley was fired, Arnold was entering the sally-port. At this "critical moment of glory and danger," his horse was killed and his own thigh-bone was shivered by a bullet—it was the leg that had been injured at Quebec and Arnold was carried from the field. What a matchless pity that, in the evening of that October day, its hero could not have been laid, "dead, safe, and honoured," in a soldier's grave!

Alexander Lindsay, Sixth Earl of Balcarres
(Reproduced, by special permission, from the original painting owned by the earl of Crawford)

With the British line thus laid open, night put an end to the conflict. The American loss for the day was about one hundred and fifty; that of the British was about four times as great, besides artillery, a large supply of ammunition, and much baggage. The Americans made good the ground that they had won and took possession of the baggage, tents, and ammunition of which they were in great need. This conflict of the 1777 seventh is variously known as the battle of Bemis Heights, Saratoga, or the second battle of Stillwater. That night, Burgoyne's left wing was kept under arms and the thoroughly exhausted men of both armies lay on the ground that they held when the fighting ceased. The Americans were inside the British lines and all realized that their safety lay in lying still. No fires burned in either camp and no sentinels broke the silence with a Who goes there? Burgoyne was "too old and clever a soldier not to recognize that the great game had gone against him." His enemy was protected by earthworks that he had himself erected and, in the morning, many of the cannons that he had lost would be pointed at his own troops. His best regiments had been tested to the limit of their endurance and had lost many of their best and bravest, and many of his Tory and Indian allies had deserted. As he had no time for sleep, so he had no time to waste. Tents were struck as quietly as possible and Balcarres's weary soldiers were aroused and marched out of their intrenchments. The shattered army fell back half a mile and occupied some hills that overlooked the river. The hills were crowned with strong redoubts and lay behind an almost impassable ravine. Burgoyne's new position was as strong as a fortress; but it covered an extent of only fifteen hundred paces square, and was commanded from end to end by artillery that was now held by the Americans. On the morning of the eighth, Burgoyne drew up his men in expectation of attack.

Burgoyne Withdraws his Army

Military Homage to a Fallen Foe

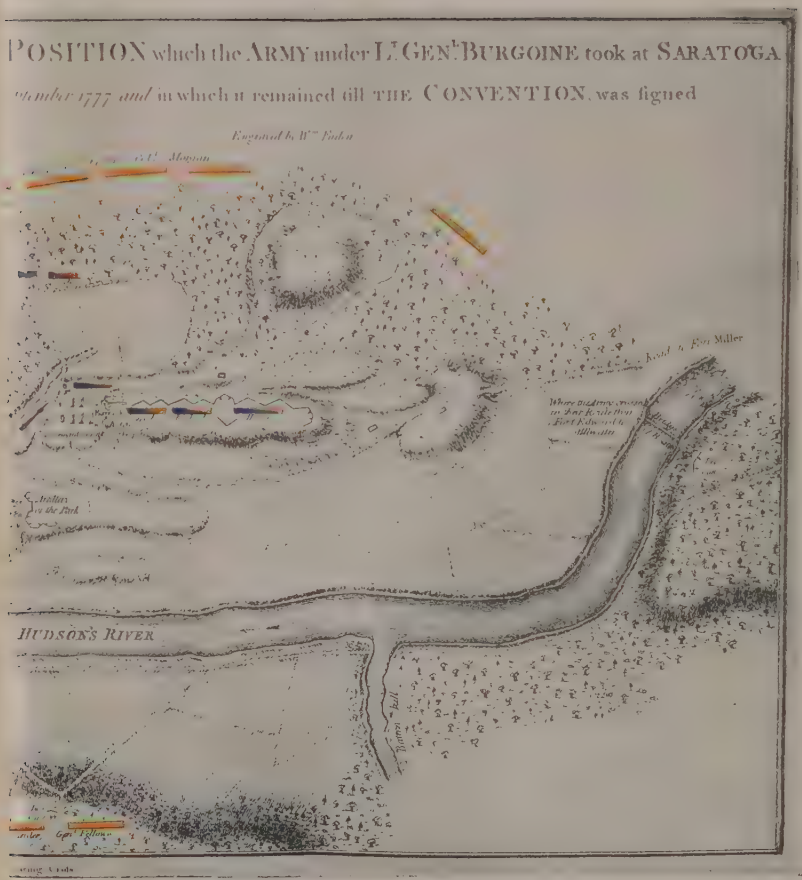

Here, in a little house on the river road, at about eight o'clock in the morning, General Fraser died. He had expressed a wish to be buried at six o'clock of the evening in the redoubt that crowned one of the hills.

October 8

In the course of the day, the Americans took an advanced position on the British front and flank and kept their guns warm with continued and brisk skirmishing in which General Lincoln was wounded. At sunset, the heroic Fraser's corpse was carried up the hill for burial as he had requested. As Burgoyne and his generals stood

FADEN'S MAP OF BUR
(From a copy in collection of the

OYNE'S SURRENDER
ew York Historical Society)

around the grave, the Americans kept up their cannonade and the heavy shot threw the loose earth over and around the chaplain as, unawed, he slowly read the impressive burial service. When the nature of the assembly at the redoubt became known on the opposite hills, the hostile 1777

"View of the West Bank of the Hudson's River three miles above Still Water, upon which the Army under the command of Lt. General Burgoyne, took post on the 20th. Sepr. 1777 (Showing General Frazer's Funeral)"

(Facsimile of an engraving published in London, 1789) missiles suddenly ceased. Then, at measured intervals, the voice of a single cannon boomed along the valley—a minute-gun fired by the Americans in honor of the gallant dead.

Burgoyne's defeat on the seventh had been signal and decisive. If he had won, he would have advanced and heard of Clinton's success and Clinton would have heard of his. The two victorious armies might then have been joined and the great object of the campaign accomplished. But he did not win the battle. His fighting force was now not more than half that of his antagonist's. Conscious of his danger that Gates would swing his left wing around so as to pen his forces between the Hudson and American brigades and batteries, Burgoyne abandoned his camp and everything that he could spare, including his sick and wounded, retreated through rain and mud to Saratoga, and, on the morning of the tenth, encamped on the north side of the Fishkill. Here he lost five precious days, a fatal indecision. He could ill afford to retreat to

Burgoyne Retreats to Saratoga

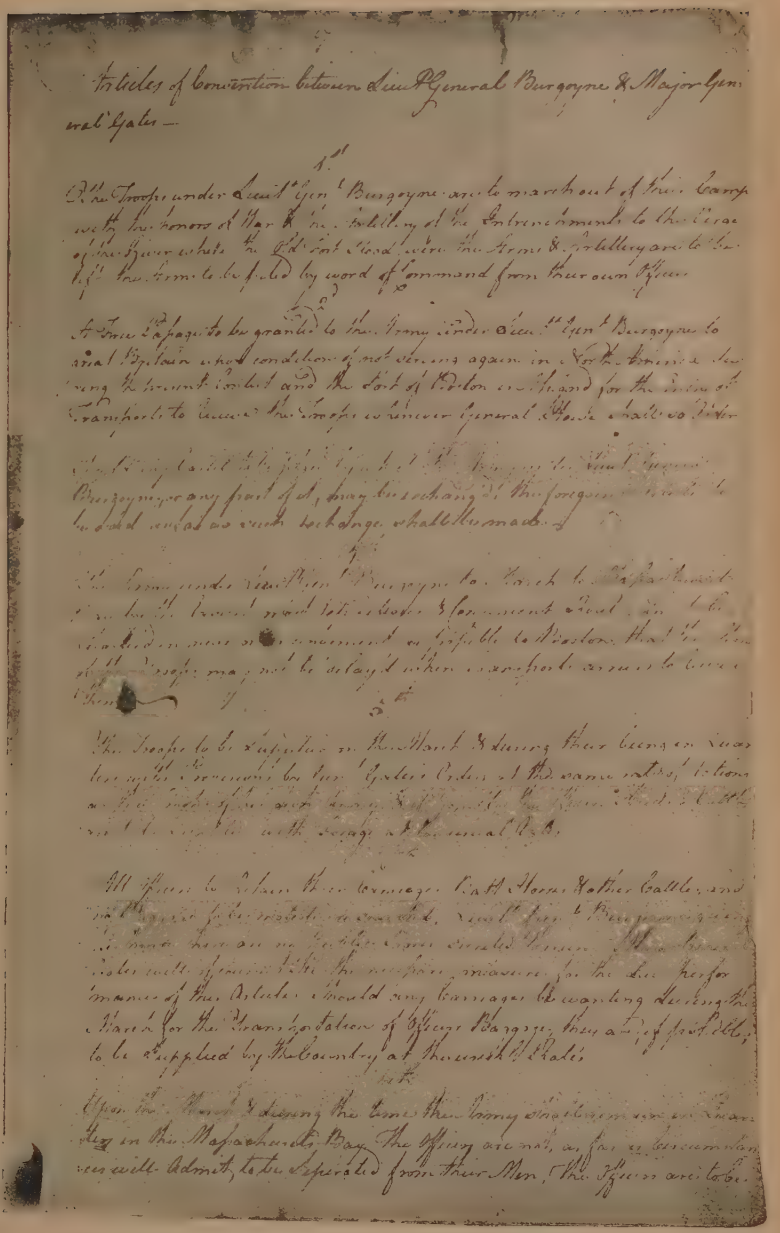

1777 Canada and hoped that in a defensive battle he might win some success and thus lessen the disasters of his campaign. According to the Baroness Riedesel, who had accompanied her husband and was in the camp, Burgoyne had lost his head and delayed retreat until escape was hopeless. To this she adds: "He spent half his nights in singing and drinking, and diverting himself with the wife of a commissary who was his mistress and who was as fond of champagne as he was himself." Gates quickly followed the retreating enemy and closed in upon them. General Fellows, with the Massachusetts militia, held the crossings of the Hudson and cut off retreat in that direction; Morgan, Poor, and Learned were threatening from the west; Nixon, Patterson, and Glover were in front.

Map of Burgoyne's Surrender at Saratoga

Burgoyne's Desperate Situation

Burgoyne's camp was about a mile and a half long and, excepting a short space here and there, not more than half a mile across. It was fortified, but on every side it was exposed to the short-range fire of the American artillery, and Morgan's marksmen spent the daylight hours in the tree-tops whence with deadly aim they fired into the interior of the principal British redoubt. Some of the provision boats were captured and others were sunk by the enemy's artillery and there were only three days' rations left. Burgoyne could not cut his way to Albany, the woods were full of continentals and militia, retreat was impossible, his effective force had dwindled to about four thousand men, and no further word had come from Sir Henry Clinton or Sir William Howe. "Shelterless and in sodden rags, our people starved and suffered," says an English historian, "while the pitiless rain descended

Articles of Convention between Lieut.ᵈ General Burgoyne & Major General Gates — 1ˢᵗ

The Troops under Lieut.ᵗ Gen.ˡ Burgoyne are to march out of their Camp with the honors of War & to the Intrenchments to the Ferry above the Fall of the River where the Arms & Artillery are to be left. The time to be fixed by word of Command from their own Officer.

2ᵈ

A Free Passport to be granted to the Army under Lieut.ᵗ Gen.ˡ Burgoyne to Great Britain upon condition of not serving again in North America during the present contest and the Port of Boston or Transport to Convey the Troops to whatever General Howe shall so direct

3ᵈ

Lieut.ᵗ Gen.ˡ Burgoyne & the Officers & Followers of the Army under Lieut.ᵗ Gen.ˡ Burgoyne may keep any part of their Baggage & Servants & no part of the same shall be searched or taken away unless such Search shall be made &

4ᵗʰ

The Troops under Lieut.ᵗ Gen.ˡ Burgoyne to march to Camp & be supplied with Provisions on the same Terms & Proportions as the Troops of the Army under Major General Gates & no Baggage shall be searched or taken away & no Baggage shall be unnecessarily detained

5ᵗʰ

The Troops to be Supplied on the March & during their Being in Camp with Provisions by the Genˡ Gates's Orders at the same rates & terms as his own Troops are supplied & the Officers to be supplied with Camp Equivalent &c.

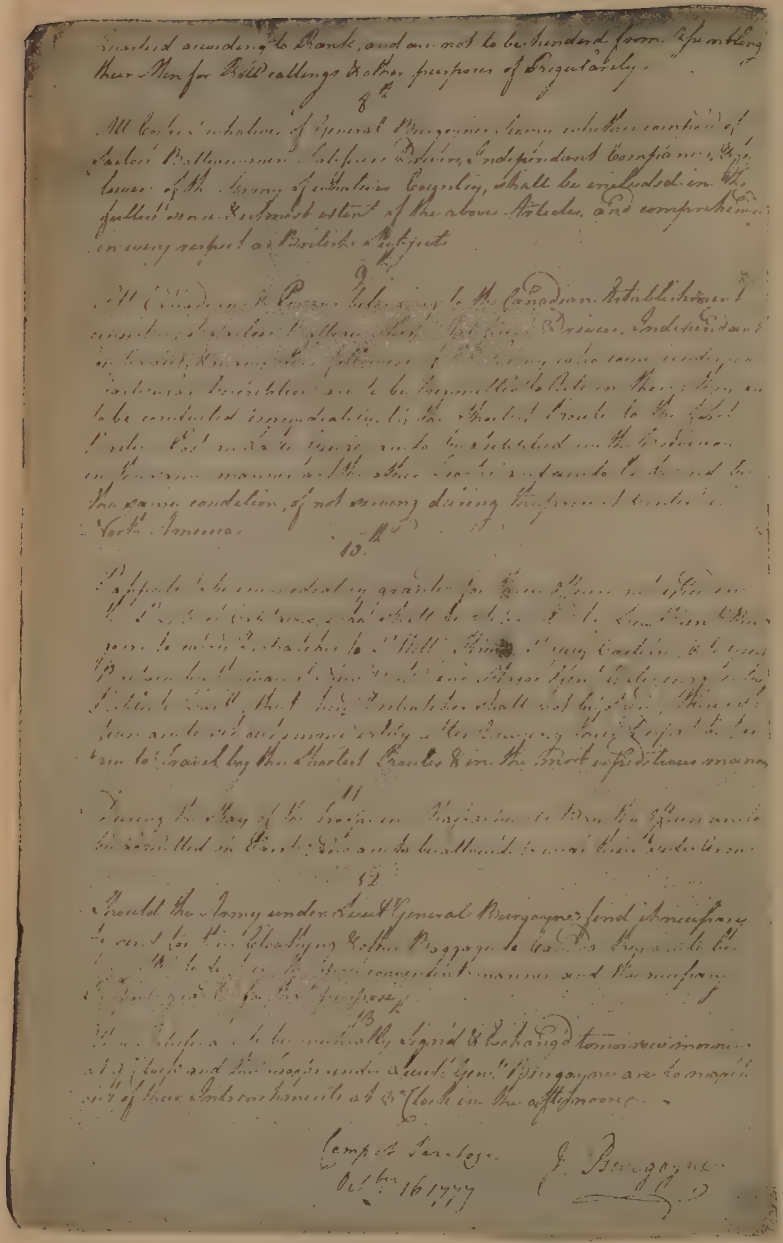

6ᵗʰ

All Officers to retain their Carriages Draft Horses & other Cattle and no Carriage or Cattle shall be taken from Lieut.ᵗ Burgoyne's Troops upon any Pretence unless Security be given for the Same & Gates will if required by the Officers Procure Waggons for the Performance of this Article. Should any Carriages be wanting during the March for the Transportation of Officers Baggage they are to be supplied if possible to be supplied by the Country at the usual Rates

7ᵗʰ

Upon the March during the time the Army shall remain in Camp & in Quarters in the Massachusetts Bay. The Officers are not, as far as circumstances will admit, to be Seperated from their Men, the Officers are to be

ARTICLES OF CONVENTION BETWEEN LIEUTENANT-G
SIGNED AT SARATOGA,
(From original document in possession

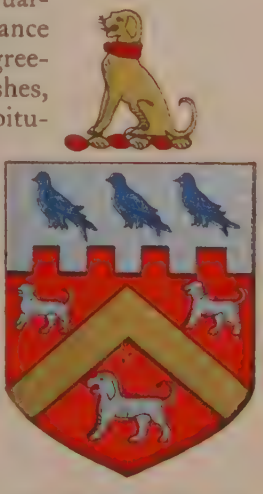

GENERAL BURGOYNE AND MAJOR-GENERAL GATES,
OCTOBER 16, 1777
of the New York Historical Society) upon them in streams, as it had continued to descend ever since the retreat began." 1777

The Articles of Capitulation

On the thirteenth of October, Burgoyne called a council of war and the council unanimously decided that the hopeless situation justified a capitulation. On the fourteenth, Burgoyne sent a staff officer "to negotiate affairs of importance to both armies." One article of Gates's proposals provided that the royal army should surrender as prisoners of war and that the British should ground arms in its encampment; to this Burgoyne replied that rather than submit to such humiliation his army would "rush on the enemy determined to take no quarter." Having heard of Clinton's easy advance up the Hudson, Gates gave way and an agreement which, in deference to Burgoyne's wishes, was called a "convention" rather than a "capitulation" was quickly reached on the sixteenth. It was agreed that the British should march out with all the honors of war and move their artillery to the bank of the river where, together with the soldiers' arms, it was to be left. Free passage to England by way of Boston was to be granted on condition that, unless exchanged, the troops should not serve "again in North America during the present contest." No private baggage belonging to the officers was "to be molested or searched, Lieutenant General Burgoyne giving his honor, there are no public stores secreted therein." The consideration shown for Burgoyne's feelings may be credited to Gates's disposition, but his lamentable carelessness as to the wording of the treaty must probably be charged to an undue haste born of his fear of Clinton's forces in his rear.

Coat of Arms of Burgoyne

The Surrender

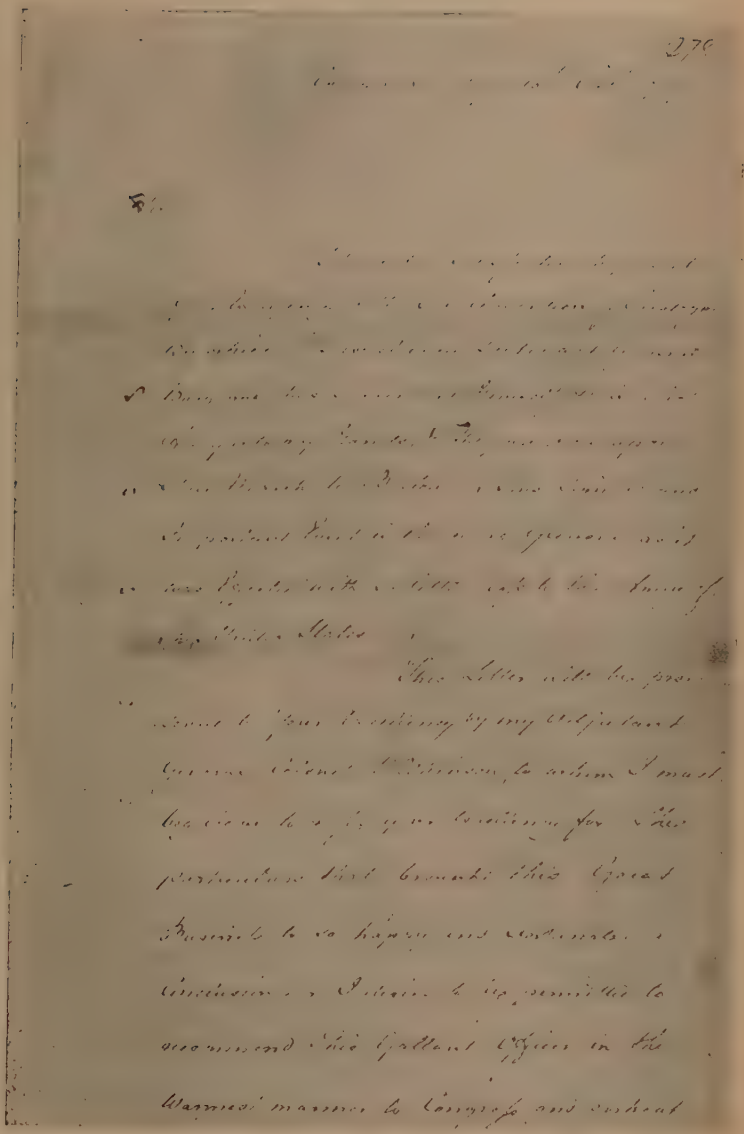

On the seventeenth, Gates ordered "The Brigades to be under Arms at their Several Encampments, exactly at nine O'Clock; the Regiment of Rifle men under Colo Morgan, and the Light Infantry under Major Dearborn to be Ready when ordered to take Possession of the 1777 Enemys Lines, and Posts, and Redoubts. . . . The man detected in Stealing the Smallest Article from any of the Prisoners, either in their quarters or on their March, must expect to be tryed by a Gen'l Court Martial, and if convicted Suffer death." At the command of their own officers, Burgoyne's troops marched out of their camp and, in the presence of two members of General Gates's staff, grounded their arms on the site of old Fort Hardy. The total number of men surrendered was about five thousand, eight hundred. The property surrendered constituted a rich and sadly needed prize. At the head of the American camp, Gates received Burgoyne with his general officers and a brilliant staff. After the "banquet of antique simplicity" that followed, General Burgoyne drew his sword in the presence of the two armies and gave it to General Gates. Gates received the sword with a courteous bow and immediately returned it to Burgoyne, the manifestation of a delicacy of feeling that reflected honor on the victorious general. Gates promptly sent Colonel Wilkinson of his staff to carry the glad tidings to congress.

A British Cartoon on the Surrender of Burgoyne

General Gates's Letter to Hancock dated Octob
(From original in Library of Con

ANNOUNCING BURGOYNE'S SURRENDER,
ER 18, 1777
gress, Division of Manuscripts)

THE SURRENDER OF BURGOYNE

(Reduced reproduction of Trumbull's famous painting in the rotunda of th

1777 Honor and Honorable Badges

Although General Burgoyne had given his honor that the baggage exempted from search should contain no public stores, advantage was taken of the exemption to save some of the flags of the surrendered army. In her Journal, the wife of General Riedesel wrote: "Now I was forced to consider how I should safely carry the colors of our German regiments still further, as we had made the Americans at Saratoga believe that they were burnt up. . . . But it was only the staves that had been burned, the colors having been thus far concealed. Now my husband confided to me his secret, and entrusted me with their still further concealment. I therefore shut myself in with a right honorable tailor, who helped me make a mattress in which we sewed every one of them. Captain O'Connell, under pretence of some errand, was dispatched to New York and passed the mattress off as his bed. He sent it to Halifax, where we again found it in our passage from New York to Canada, and where—in order to ward off all suspicion in case our ship should be taken—I transferred it to my cabin, and slept during the whole of the remaining voyage to Canada upon those honorable badges." As to the British flags, Burgoyne declared that they had all been left in Canada. It is known that one of them had been displayed at Ticonderoga and that, after the convention had been agreed upon, Lieutenant-colonel Hill concealed the colors of the ninth regiment in his baggage. Upon his return to England in 1781, Hill presented the colors to King George.

Punic Faith

But the dishonorable action connected with the convention was not confined to one side. Americans quickly realized that Gates had been overreached in the negotiation; the less brilliant but more able Schuyler would have done better. If the prisoners were allowed to return to England, they could, without any violation of the terms of the agreement, be used to relieve garrisons at home, thus setting other soldiers free to fight in America. Furthermore, the leaders in congress felt sure that France would soon be at war with England in behalf

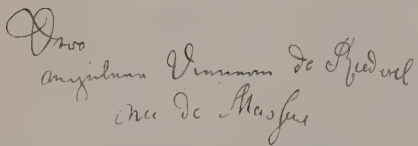

BARONESS RIEDESEL, BY TISCHBEIN

BARON RIEDESEL, BY TISCHBEIN

Reproduced in close facsimile of the originals, by courtesy of the present owner, Baron Gottfried von Rotenhan, at Rentweinsdorf, Bavaria. Painted in 1760

BARONESS RIEDESEL, née VON MASSOW

From Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, October, 1906. This reproduction follows the Tischbein portrait

AUGUSTA, AFTERWARDS COUNTESS REUSS

Oldest daughter of Baron and Baroness Riedesel

From original painting in possession of Baron von Rotenhan, at Neuenhof, Weimar

Baron Riedesel, by Schroeder

Baroness Riedesel, by Schroeder

Reproduced in close facsimile of the originals, by courtesy of the present owner, the Chamberlain Baron von Rotenhan, at Neuenhof, Weimar. Painted at end of the eighteenth century

Frederika, afterwards Countess Reden

Second daughter of Baron and Baroness Riedesel

From original painting in possession of Baron von Rotenhan, at Neuenhof, Weimar

Amerika, afterwards Countess Bernstorf

Youngest daughter of Baron and Baroness Riedesel, born in America—hence her name

From her descended the present (1909) German Ambassador, Count Bernstorf

From original painting in possession of Baron von Rotenhan, at Neuenhof, Weimar

There was also another daughter, Caroline, of whom no separate portrait is extant of the revolted colonies. Under the terms of the Saratoga convention, Burgoyne's troops might be used against the French anywhere outside America; it was better that they be safely held as long as the war lasted. Congress was tempted to break the treaty and the British furnished the desired excuse. Dissatisfied with the quarters provided for his officers, Burgoyne, in a letter to Gates, incautiously wrote: "The public faith is broke." If he believed that faith had already been broken by the Americans, would he not be likely to take advantage of the pretended breach to disregard other provisions of the 1777

November 14

Bronze Medal awarded by Congress to Horatio Gates convention as soon as he and his soldiers were afloat on the high seas? Burgoyne also refused to furnish, for purposes of identification, descriptive lists of persons concerned in the convention and alleged that the demand was insulting to his country. Such lists had not been provided for in the convention, but Burgoyne later acceded to the demand. There was wrangling about other matters and, on the third of January, 1778, congress voted to hold the troops until the convention had been ratified by Great Britain, a mere pretext for delay. Five days later, congress voted that the convention was broken because the British had failed to deliver up some of the cartouch-boxes and "several other articles of military equipment." Even as fair and friendly a historian as Trevelyan is compelled to say that "when every allowance has been made and all excuses have been impartially considered, the violation of the Saratoga Treaty remains as a blot on the lustre of the American Revolution."

1777
1783

The End of Burgoyne and His Army

After further disgraceful quibbling, Burgoyne and his staff were allowed to return to England on parole. Burgoyne had an early interview with Lord Germain, but was refused an audience by the king. He took his seat in parliament, joined the opposition, was denied a court martial, and soon resigned his civil and military offices, a victim of ministerial wrath and public opinion. He died at London in 1792. In November, 1778, the "convention troops," numbering more than four thousand, marched southward from Massachusetts; early in the following year, they arrived at Charlottesville in Virginia. In 1780, because of danger from Cornwallis, they were sent to the Shenandoah valley, to Frederick in Maryland, and to Lancaster in Pennsylvania. From time to time, some were exchanged and others deserted; some joined the Americans and some were still prisoners when the war ended. A large number,

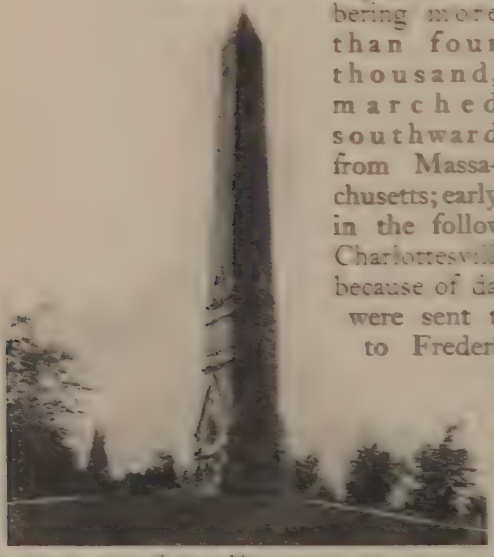

Boot worn by Hessian Dragoon of Riedesel's Forces

Taken prisoner at Saratoga, [illegible] to Easton, Pa., [illegible] prisoners and were then [illegible] to Newburgh. There he exchanged them for lighter ones. Its dimensions are:

Length of leg, front,	20⅝ inches
Length of bottom, heel to toe,	13¾ inches
Width of sole and heel,	4⅝ inches
Thickness of heel and sole,	1⅝ inches
Present weight (originally doubtless much more),	5¾ lbs.

At Washington's Headquarters Museum, Newburgh, N. Y.

Saratoga Monument

Pistol from the Saratoga Battle-field

Dinner-plate used at the Entertainment of Burgoyne at the old Sylvester Home at Kinderhook, New York, after his Surrender

(Both items kindly loaned by present owner, Mr. Samuel Ludlow Frey, Palatine Bridge, New York) especially of the Germans, remained in the United States and became citizens thereof. 1777

The fact that a British army that had set out so proudly had been forced to lay down its arms excited transports of joy among all patriots. Few of them now doubted the ultimate achievement of independence and all of them hoped that the success would lead France to declare in favor of America. In England, the news was received with dismay by one party and with satisfaction by the other. In the house of lords, Lord Chatham said: "Those men whom you called cowards, poltroons, runaways, and knaves, are become victorious over your veteran troops, and in the midst of victory and the flush of conquest have set ministers an example of moderation and magnanimity well worthy of imitation." The English historian, Creasy, counts Saratoga among the fifteen decisive battles of world history and adds the statement that no military event can be said "to have exercised more important influence on the future fortunes of mankind than the complete defeat of Burgoyne's expedition in 1777; a defeat which rescued the revolted colonies from certain subjection, and which, by inducing the courts of France and Spain to attack England in their behalf, insured the independence of the United States." In similar strain, Lord Mahon declares that the surrender of Burgoyne "not merely changed the relations of England and the feelings of Europe towards these insurgent Colonies, but it has modified for all time to come the connexion between every Colony and every parent State."

The Effects of the Victory

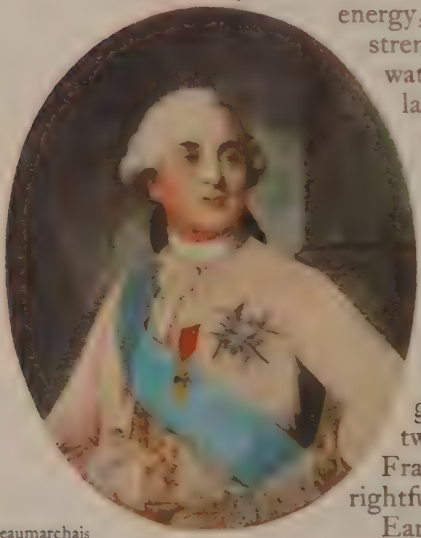

CHAPTER V

FOREIGN RELATIONS AND THE FRENCH ALLIANCE

Vergennes

THE Seven Years' war had weakened and humiliated France but had not destroyed the pride of her people or the determination of her statesmen to regain what had been lost. With unrelenting energy, her great minister, Choiseul, strengthened the French navy, and watched for a weak spot in England's armor. Louis XV. died in 1774 and was succeeded by his grandson, Louis XVI., a youth of good intentions and feeble will. The new prime minister was the comte de Maurepas, but Maurepas was old and the department of foreign affairs was in the hands of Charles Gravier, comte de Vergennes, who was possessed by two absorbing ideas—to restore France to what he considered her rightful rank and to humble England.

Louis XVI.
(From painting by Duplessis, in Versailles Gallery, Paris)

Beaumarchais

Early in 1776, Vergennes laid before the king a memorial on foreign affairs suggesting that "all means should be employed to render the next campaign as animated as possible and to procure advantages to the Americans." But the kings of France and Spain were not ready for a policy of undisguised assistance, and so Vergennes prepared a second memorial. The British ministry was to be deluded into a belief in the pacific purposes of France and Spain, and "the courage of the Americans should be kept up by the secret favors and vague hopes that will prevent accommodation." In spite of the contrary views of Maurepas and Turgot, Vergennes's policy prevailed and, in May, we find him writing to the king a letter of which, according to Lecky, "it is no exaggeration to say that it is more like the letter of a conspirator than of the minister of a great nation." He was about to authorize Caron de Beaumarchais (better known as the author of The Barber of Seville and The Marriage of Figaro than as the secret agent of the French government) to furnish the Americans with a million livres, about two hundred thousand dollars. 1776

In November, 1775, congress had appointed a committee of five on secret correspondence to communicate with friends of America in other countries and, in the spring of 1776, Silas Deane of Connecticut was sent to France as a secret political and financial agent. Deane arrived at Paris in June. His early solicitations for an interview with Vergennes were persistently denied, but within two hours after receipt of news of the declaration of independence and of Arnold's action on Lake Champlain he received a card from the minister requesting his immediate presence. At the conference that soon followed, Deane was cordially received — Deane

August

Silas Deane
(From engraving in the New York Public Library, Emmet Collection)

1776 the beginning of fruitful diplomatic relations between France and the United States.

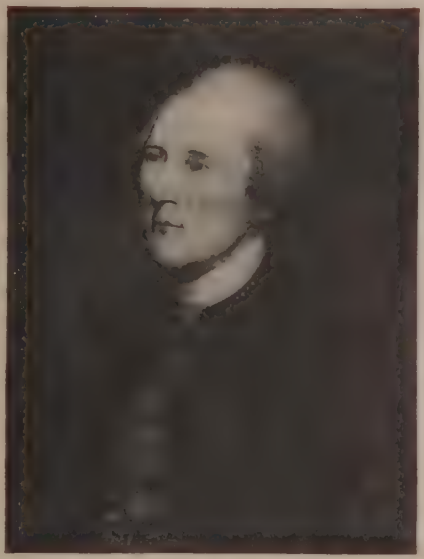

How it was Done

As a screen for contemplated operations, the fictitious firm of "Roderique Hortalez et Cie." had established its headquarters on a prominent street in Paris; the "firm" soon was selling to Deane, as "Timothy Jones," a Bermuda merchant, supplies for the American colonies. Thus Beaumarchais brought to Deane a first loan of a million livres to which was added another million sent by Spain. With this money, munitions of war were bought from the royal arsenals of France; and before the end of 1776, Deane secured thirty thousand stand of arms, thirty thousand suits of clothes, more than two hundred and fifty cannons (cast in the royal gun factories, but on which, by some convenient carelessness, the royal arms had not been stamped), and other military stores. When Lord Stormont, the British ambassador, made complaint, Vergennes openly forbade the ships of Roderique Hortalez et Cie. to sail from France and quietly allowed them to slip off as usual, and promised to put bonds on American privateers in French ports and left them undisturbed as before. Under such provocation, Stormont assumed so arrogant a tone that Vergennes replied: "If, sir, this is a declaration of war that you are making, allow me to go and announce it to the king." In September, congress chose Franklin and Jefferson to act with Deane as commissioners at Paris for the negotiation of treaties with foreign powers. For family reasons, Jefferson declined the service and congress appointed the somewhat querulous Arthur Lee in his place.

Arthur Lee

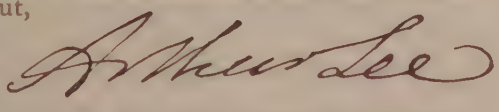

Since 1770, Arthur Lee, a Virginian who had been educated in England and had for ten years lived at the British capital, had acted as London agent for Massachusetts. At this time, he was also acting as the secret agent of the congressional committee on secret correspondence. Apparently in the hope of playing the principal part in the negotiations with France, Lee now hurried to Paris, quarreled with Deane, tried to disturb the relations between Deane and Beaumarchais, failing in which he returned to London furious at both. In his jealousy, he wrote to congress, unjustly charging that, for the sake of personal gain, Beaumarchais and Deane were trying to transform what was intended as a gratuity into a commercial transaction. It was inevitable that the association of Lee with Franklin and Deane as joint commissioners at Paris would result in trouble; from it came a controversy that lasted more than half a century. 1776

Franklin Goes to France

Although more than seventy years of age and tortured by disease, Franklin accepted the mission to Paris, saying to Doctor Rush: "I am old and good for nothing; but, as the store-keepers say of their remnants of cloth, I am but a fag end, and you may have me for what you please to give." After placing all his available funds in the hands of congress, he embarked in a sloop of war carrying a consignment of indigo that was to be sold in France for the purpose of defraying the initial expenses of the American legation. The sloop was chased by a British war vessel, but sailed into Quiberon Bay with two prizes. Franklin soon arrived at Paris and entered upon his mission under favorable auspices. France prostrated herself at his feet and made him the symbol and object

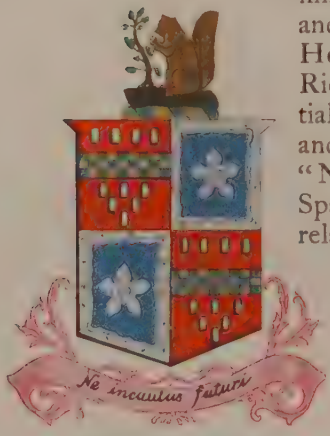

Autograph of Doctor Benjamin Rush

December 21

1777 of her adoration. "He came like a fresh and invigorating breeze. . . . His republican simplicity, like Ithuriel's spear, approached the intrenched methods of duplicity and deception and they shriveled at his touch. As legends of Richard the Lion-hearted still haunt the Arabian East, so do tales of Franklin, apocryphal or true, still survive in France."

Lee's Intrigues

After Franklin's arrival at Paris, Lee's monomania led him to continue his attacks upon Deane and to intrigue against both his colleagues. He wrote many letters to his brother, Richard Henry Lee, and to other influential persons at home charging Franklin and Deane with inefficiency and fraud. "No one who examines the subject," says Sparks, "can doubt that Mr. Lee's quarrels with Deane, his hostility to Franklin, and his disputes with everybody, a select few only excepted, were the primary causes of the warm altercations and endless perplexities which distracted the deliberations of congress on foreign affairs during two or three years of the most anxious period of the Revolution."

Coat of Arms of Richard Henry Lee

Deane's Recall

On the eighth of December, congress had passed a resolution recalling Deane to America on the pretext of obtaining information as to the state of affairs in Europe. Deane at once took passage, bringing letters of confidence from Franklin and Vergennes. Expecting to be received with applause for the services he had rendered, he found a cold reception and was kept waiting for a year and a half for a settlement of his accounts. Even then a just settlement was refused him. He was turned away from the doors of a body that should have manifested its gratitude and, disappointed and aggrieved, returned to Europe, a real exile. In 1789, he died in poverty in England. Congress did not intend to do Deane an injustice, but "it was misled by the malevolence of Lee, and its action brought about the disgrace of the earliest diplomatic representative of the country." Fifty-eight years later, congress vindicated him by paying to his heirs about thirty-seven thousand dollars. 1776 1777

Soon after Franklin reached Paris, he and his colleagues had a private interview with Vergennes. But diplomacy can do little in the face of military reverses and the commissioners reported to congress that "this court, while it treated us privately with all civility, was cautious of giving umbrage, and was, therefore desirous of avoiding open reception and acknowledgement of us, or entering into any formal negotiations with us as ministers from Congress." The envoys had perforce to wait, hoping for news of victory. Meanwhile, Franklin devoted himself to the not difficult task of winning the French people to his views. The Waiting Season December 28

In this interval and subsequently, overtures were made to other European courts. What John Adams called the "militia" policy was given a thorough trial. The party in congress that "believed in amateur generals and advocated a headlong strategy in war, pinned its faith in amateur ambassadors" and unceremoniously sent agents to European capitals to obtain recognition and loans. In the spring of 1777, and under instructions from home, Arthur Lee set out for Madrid. In heralding his approach to the court of Spain, he described the American republic as an infant Hercules who had strangled serpents in the cradle and declared that the hour had come to clip the wings of Britain and to pinion her forever. But the Spanish court was not moved by his mixed metaphors. He was not allowed to proceed beyond Burgos, though hopes were held out that Spain might render assistance within a year. Militia Diplomacy March 8

Arthur Lee's brother William, being accredited to Vienna, was informed that his presence at that capital was not desired; he was careful not to show himself within a hundred leagues of his destination. Ralph Izard, named as representative to Tuscany, had a similar experience and did not even leave Paris. Later in the war, Francis Dana was accredited to Russia; he reached Saint Peters- Cold Comfort July 1 July 1

1777 burg in 1781, but Catherine the Great shrank from giving 1779 offense to England; her ministers informed him that he must not even petition to be received at court. As official society closed its doors against him and his existence was studiously ignored by the English who were the only people in Saint Petersburg with whom he could exchange an intelligible sentence, he lived in mortifying isolation.

Frederick the Great

Equally disappointing were the overtures made to Prussia. Frederick the Great, ablest and craftiest of all the monarchs of the day, had not forgiven England for deserting him in the Seven Years' war; for the party in power there he entertained a bitter hatred. Because of this hatred, he had repelled English overtures for assistance. "My indifference," he wrote to his minister at London, "can surprise nobody: 'a scalded cat dreads cold water,' says the proverb; and, in fact, what union could be contracted with this crown after the signal experience I have had of its duplicity? If it would give me all the millions possible, I would not furnish it two small files of my troops." But neither friendship nor hatred could influence him into following a course inimical to the interests of Prussia. He knew that Maria Theresa still hated him and that her son, the young Emperor Joseph, was full of ambitious schemes for the aggrandizement of Austria and the humiliation of Prussia. He was too wise to allow personal prejudices to lead him into open hostility to such a formidable power as England. At the same time, he was anxious to embroil France whose young queen was Maria Theresa's daughter. This would prevent that power from playing an active part in German affairs.

Lee's Advance on Berlin

The first direct overture made by America to Prussia occurred late in 1776. In November of that year, William Carmichael went to Berlin to make proposals of a commercial nature, but was unable to accomplish anything of importance. In the following February, the American commissioners at Paris transmitted to the Prussian court copies of the declaration of independence and expressed a desire to obtain Frederick's friendship and to lay before him a plan for commercial intercourse. Thinking that in case of the success of the revolt the American market might prove valuable, Frederick instructed Baron Schulenburg, his minister of state, not to "offend the colonies by a complete refusal." In the following April, when the American commissioners wrote that one of their number would shortly visit Berlin "properly empowered to treat upon affairs of importance," Frederick thought the Americans "in too much of a hurry" and Schulenburg wrote to Arthur Lee to discourage him from coming. 1777

Hohenzollern Prudence

Before Schulenburg's letter reached Paris, Lee was on his way to Berlin. On his arrival, he was told that his stay would not be disagreeable to the king provided he did not assume a public character. Frederick instructed Schulenburg "to continue the same tone with him." To his brother, Prince Henry, the king wrote: "I purpose to draw out this negotiation in order to fall in with the side for which Fortune shall declare herself." Early in August, Lee returned to Paris, after having had his papers stolen by an agent of the English minister. The theft made Frederick very angry, but, desirous of not further straining his relations with England, he indulged in a few English expletives and took no violent action. After his return to Paris, Lee continued to inform the Prussian court of the progress of the war and to urge that Prussian ports be opened to American vessels. "Put him off with compliments" was Frederick's direction to Schulenburg, and the direction was followed. In November, Frederick refused to receive William Lee who had been accredited to Berlin.

Belated Recognition

When he heard of Burgoyne's surrender, Frederick assured the Americans that he would recognize their independence "when France, which is more directly interested in the event of this contest, shall have given the example." They were also told that they might purchase arms in Prussia and that the firm of "Splittgerber, contractors for the manufacture of arms, have received

January, 1778

1777 directions to deliver such as you may demand." Under 1778 this permission, Arthur Lee purchased eight hundred fusils, but later found that they were old worn-out guns and useless. When Lee demanded that the firm should be compelled to do justice, Schulenburg told him that, as a good republican, he ought to know that the Prussian king had no power arbitrarily to right private breaches of contract. The attempt of Austria to seize Bavaria gave Frederick a convenient pretext for refusing to keep his promise to recognize America when France led the way. As Trevelyan says: "It was not until the rebellion had finally triumphed, and the world was once more at peace, that he followed the lead of Great Britain herself, and, long after the twelfth hour had struck, recognized the United States as an independent nation."

The Break of Day

Meanwhile, Franklin had won over the French people "heart and soul," but the French government remained timid. In July, 1777, Vergennes decided to render America more direct aid, but delayed in the hope of inducing Spain to join in the movement. While he was waiting, he heard of the fall of Ticonderoga and of Howe's victorious advance. The tone of the French government changed; supplies were more difficult to obtain; American privateers were seized in French ports; Beaumarchais was in despair; "My government," he said to Franklin, "will cut my throat as if I were a sheep." Then came the news of Saratoga. France was delighted and the difficulties of the American commissioners vanished. A courier was hurried to Madrid to gain the concurrence of Charles III. and work on treaties of commerce and alliance was begun. On the sixth of February, 1778, the two treaties were signed. On that day, according to a popular story, Franklin wore the suit of spotted Manchester velvet in which he had appeared before the privy council when he was denounced by Wedderburn.

December 7

The Treaties

The treaty of amity and commerce followed, in the main, lines that had been laid down by congress. That body had not even authorized the other and more impor-

C A N A D A
Anciens Outaouacs
Anciens Algonquins
Les Hurons
LAC HURON
LAC ONTARIO
LAC ERIE
NOUVELLE YORK
Iroquois
Les Cinq Nations
Les Tsonnontouans
Les Onneyouts
Les Goyogouins
Les Sonontouans
Les Agnies
Les Tuteloes
Les Mohins
Les Mohicans
Les Loups
Les Delawares
Les Shawanons
Les Nanticokes
Les Conoys
PENSILVANIE
Cte de Northampton
Cte de Champlain
Cte de Clinton
Cte de Gloucester
Cte de Suffolk
Cte de Dutchess
Cte de Ulster
Cte de Albany
Cte de Tryon
Cte de Montgomery
Cte de Charlotte
Cte de Cumberland
Cte de Bedford
Cte de Huntingdon
Cte de Northumberland
Cte de Berks
Cte de Lancaster
Cte de Chester
Cte de Philadelphie
Cte de Bucks
Cte de Sussex
Cte de Kent
Cte de Newcastle
Cte de Glocester
Cte de Salem
Cte de Cumberland
Cte de Hunterdon
Cte de Middlesex
Cte de Monmouth
Cte de Burlington
Cte de Gloucester
Cte de Salem
Cte de Cumberland
Cte de Hunterdon
Cte de Middlesex
Cte de Monmouth
Cte de Burlington

French Map of the United States, 1778

(Published, Paris, 1778. Said to be the first map published in France in which this country is called "Etats Unis" — United States. Reproduced from copy in the Library of Congress, Map Division)

tant treaty — the first and the only treaty of alliance into which the United States has ever entered. This second treaty declared the absolute and unlimited independence of the United States to be the chief aim of the alliance and provided for combined military movements in case England should declare war upon France. No treaty of peace was to be made by either power without the approval of the other. The United States guaranteed to France her existing American possessions and those that she might acquire by treaty, while France guaranteed to the United States her existing possessions and any acquisitions that she might make in the course of the war. A separate and secret agreement reserved for the king of Spain the right to become a party to the compact. The news of the alliance was received in the United States in April; the treaties were ratified by congress on the second of May. At Valley Forge, a day set apart for general rejoicing was observed with all the pomp and pageantry that such a camp could provide. In all the colonies, the treaties brought to the patriots encouragement and joy. 1778

> Once more! the land of arms and arts,
> Of glory, grace, romance;
> Her love lies warm in all our hearts:
> God bless her! Vive la France!

English Indignation

Within two days, the British ministry knew of the signing of the treaties — ample occasion for a fresh quarrel between Arthur Lee and Silas Deane. A month later, the French ambassador at London announced the alliance by leaving a rescript with the English secretary of state. Of course, England was indignant and the indignation blazed up fierce and high. The British ambassador was recalled from Paris; the French ambassador left London and was pelted as he passed through the streets of Canterbury on his way to Dover. War was not formally declared, but hostilities between the two ancient enemies were begun in May. March 13

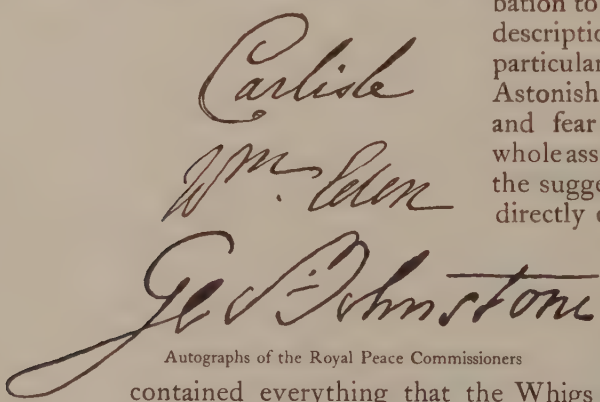

Attempted Reconciliation

The English ministry had foreseen the gathering storm and had begun to make preparation for it. Not long before the adjournment of parliament, Lord North, with 1777 the unwilling consent of the king, announced that after 1778 the holidays the ministry would bring in conciliatory

December 10 resolutions. Chatham urged immediate action, declaring that there was no time to lose. Eleven days after the signing of the treaties at Paris, the prime minister announced his scheme for the reconciliation of the alien-
February 17 ated colonies. The tax on tea, the commercial restrictions, the Boston port act, the law that destroyed the Massachusetts charter, and other odious acts were to be repealed; full and general pardon was to be proclaimed; England was to grant everything asked for by America except independence. Commissioners were to be sent over to arrange the details of pacification and they were to be empowered to address the American commander-in-chief and other officers and officials "by any style or title" that the personages saw fit to assume. "Small or great, ceremonial or essential, every point in the dispute between the British Cabinet and the Continental Congress was surrendered without ambiguity and without reserve," says the English historian, Trevelyan.

The Carlisle Commission

The speech, says the Annual Register, was "heard with profound attention, but without a single mark of approbation to any part, from any description of men or any particular man in the House. Astonishment, dejection, and fear overclouded the whole assembly." Although the suggested measures ran directly counter to all that the party in power had been fighting for, the Tories followed their leaders. As they contained everything that the Whigs had contended for (except the Rockingham faction which favored independence), the Whigs could not consistently oppose them. The bills were passed in March and the earl of Carlisle,

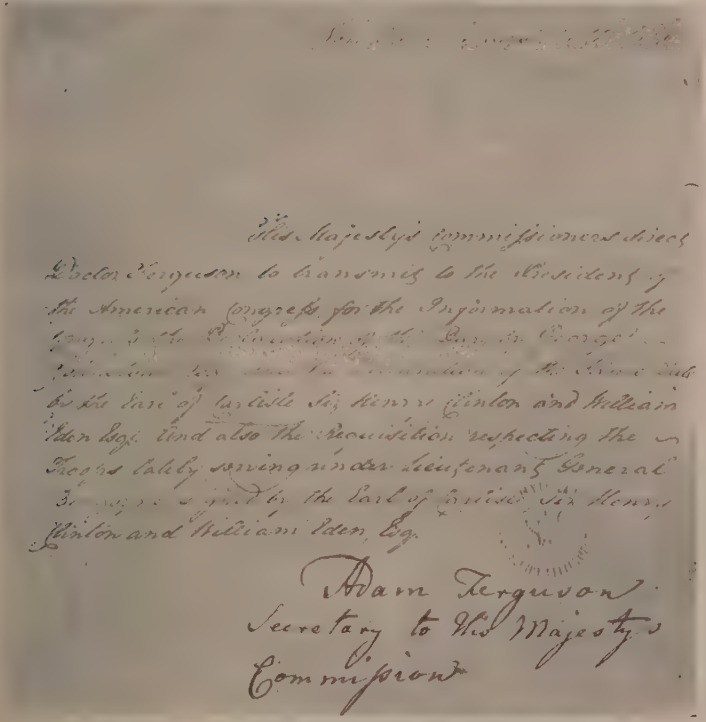

Autographs of the Royal Peace Commissioners

George Johnstone, and William Eden were sent as commissioners to the United States. 1778

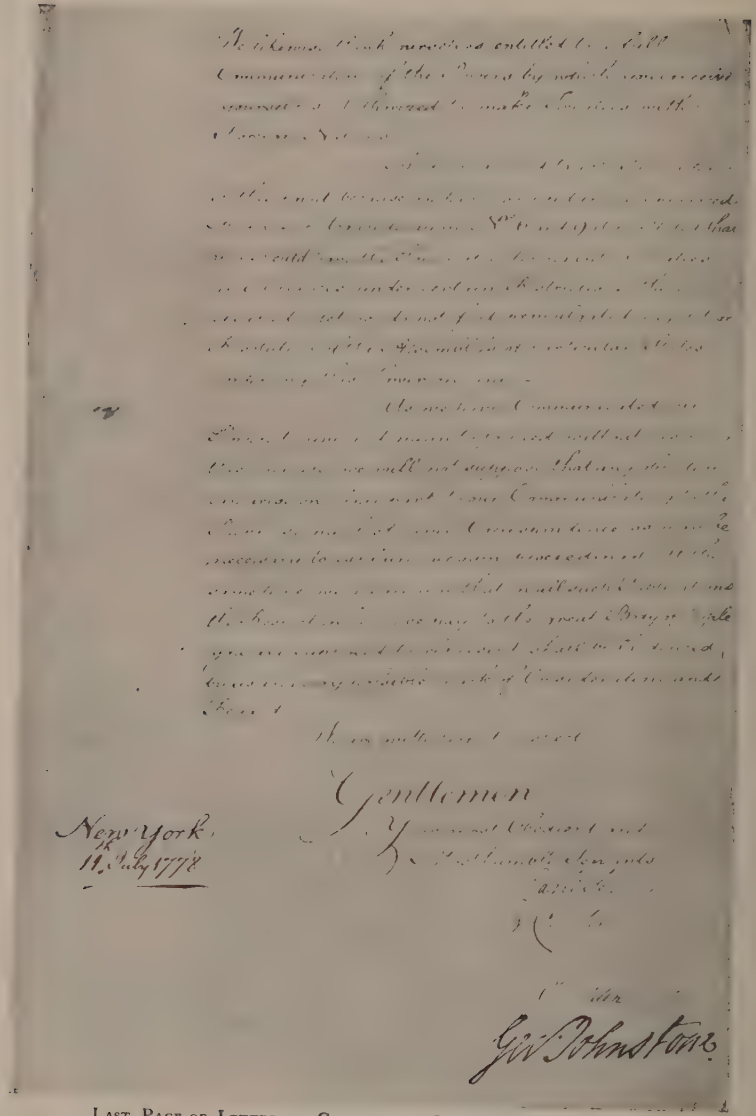

In this hour of danger, the eyes of Englishmen turned to Chatham as the only man who could save England from destruction. He was feared in France and loved in America. If conciliation was possible, he was the man to bring it about; if war was the only alternative, he was the man to manage the war. Lord North implored King George to send for Chatham; Bute, Mansfield, and others of Chatham's enemies and political opponents favored such a step; the people almost universally demanded it. But the king was obstinate. He clearly foresaw that the accession of Chatham would mean recession from the system of personal government that

Lord Chatham Wanted

His Majesty's commissioners direct Adam Ferguson to transmit to the President of the American Congress for the Information of the Congress the Resolution of the Parliament of Great Britain for the Conciliation of the Colonies and to the Earl of Carlisle Sir Henry Clinton and William Eden Esqrs. and also the Requisition respecting the Troops lately serving under Lieutenant General Burgoyne signed by the Earl of Carlisle Sir Henry Clinton and William Eden Esq.

Adam Ferguson
Secretary to His Majesty's Commissions

Pass given to Adam Ferguson by the Royal Peace Commissioners

New York
11. July 1778

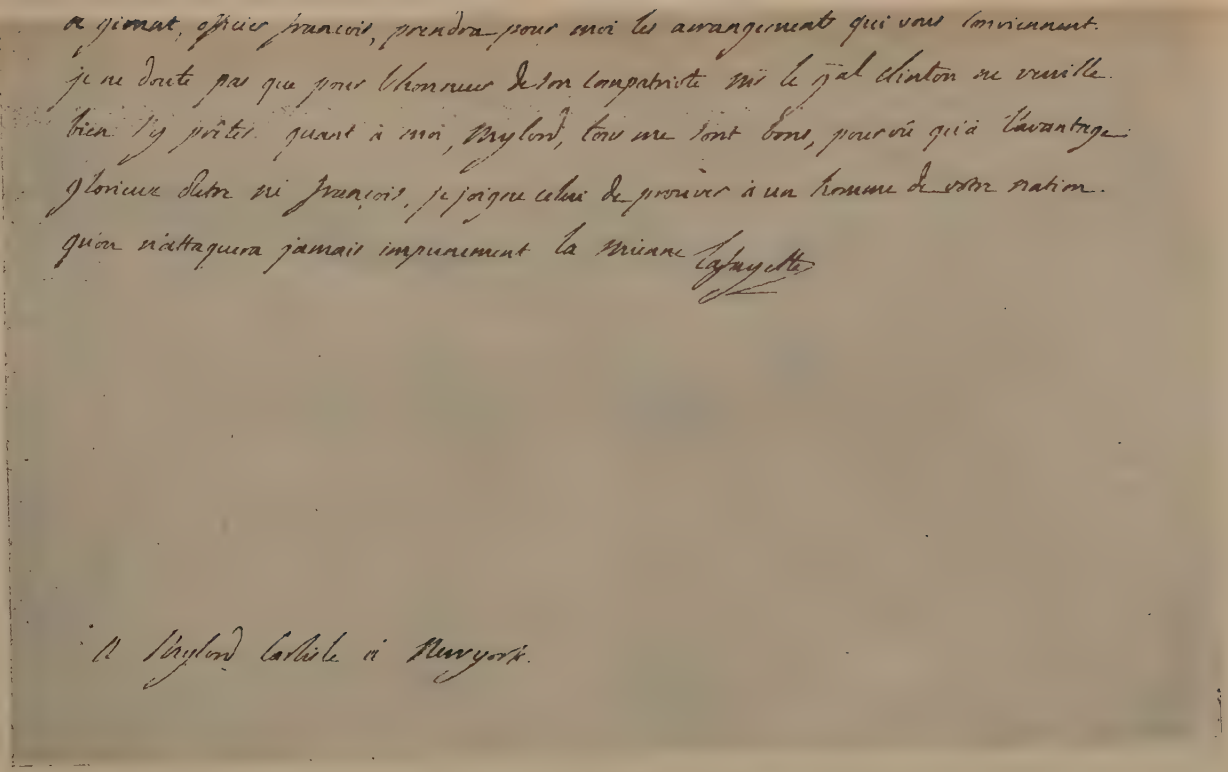

Gentlemen

Geo. Johnstone

LAST PAGE OF LETTER TO CONGRESS BY CARLISLE, CLINTON, EDEN, AND JOHNSTONE, DATED JULY 11, 1778
(From original in the Library of Congress)

Falkirk le 5 octobre 1778

Je n'avois cru jusqu'ici, Mylord, avoir jamais besoin qu'avec vos generaux et je reconnois l'honneur de les voir qui à la tête des troupes qui nous ont respectivement combattus. votre lettre du 26 aoust au congrès des etats unis et la phrase insultante pour ma patrie que vous y avez tracée, pouvoit seule me donner quelque chose à demêler avec vous. je ne daigne pas la refuter, Mylord, mais je desire la punir. c'est vous comme chef de la commission que je nomme de vous donner une reparation aussi publique que la cité l'offensée et que le sera le dementi qui la suit. il n'auroit pas autant tardé si la lettre me fut parvenue plûtôt. obligé de m'absenter quelques jours, j'espere trouver en revenant votre [illegible] repondre. etc a gentilhomme officier français, prendra pour moi les arrangements qui vous conviennent.

je ne doute pas que pour l'honneur de son compatriote mr le gal clinton ne veuille bien s'y prêter. quant à moi, Mylord, tous me sont bons, pourvû qu'ils m'donnent glorieux de battre un français, je joigne celui de prouver à un homme de votre nation qu'on n'attaquera jamais impunément la probité Lafayette

A Mylord Carlisle à Newyork.

LAFAYETTE'S CHALLENGE TO LORD CARLISLE, OCTOBER 5, 1778

(Sent because of an alleged insult to France contained in a public letter written by this nobleman. Reproduced from a facsimile of the original in the Library of Congress, Division of Manuscripts) he had laboriously created. He was willing for Chatham to become a subordinate minister under North, but he would not go further. "No advantage to this country," he said, "no present danger to myself, can ever make me address myself to Lord Chatham or to any other branch of the Opposition." "Whilst any ten men in the kingdom will stand by me I will not give myself up into bondage," he declared later. 1778

Chatham's Death

On the seventh of April, the duke of Richmond moved an address to the crown, asking the king to withdraw his fleets and armies from the revolted provinces and "to effectuate conciliation with them on such terms as might preserve their good will." On crutches and wrapped in flannel to his knees, Chatham hobbled into the house of lords and spoke against the motion. "His sunk and hueless face, rendered the more ghastly by the still penetrating brilliancy of his eyes, bore plainly on it the impress of approaching death." His voice was barely audible in the almost breathless silence of the house as he protested "against the dismemberment of this ancient and most noble monarchy" and laughed to scorn the danger of invasion. Richmond made respectful answer and Chatham essayed a reply. After two or three unsuccessful efforts to rise, he fell backward; on the eleventh of May, he died. The address to the crown was rejected by a small majority.

It Might Have Been

It may well be doubted whether even Chatham could have effected a reconciliation. Governor Clinton of New York declared that Lord North was "two years too late with his political manœuvre" and Jay found no one willing to accept peace on the terms offered. Congress resolved to hold no "conference or treaty with any commissioners on the part of Great Britain until they shall, as a preliminary thereto, either withdraw their fleets and armies, or else in positive and express terms acknowledge the independence of the said States." The commissioners reached Philadelphia in June, but congress, in terms curt, conclusive, and almost defiant, refused to negotiate with them. The commissioners then issued a procla- April 22

By the CONGRESS of the UNITED STATES of AMERICA.

MANIFESTO.

THESE United States, having been driven to hoſtilities by the oppreſſive and tyrannous meaſures of Great-Britain; having been compelled to commit the eſſential rights of man to the deciſion of arms; and having been at length forced to ſhake off a yoke which had grown too burthenſome to bear, they declared themſelves free and independent.

Confiding in the juſtice of their cauſe; confiding in Him who diſpoſes of human events, although weak and unprovided, they ſet the power of their enemies at defiance.

In this confidence they have continued, through the various fortune of three bloody campaigns, unawed by the power, unſubdued by the barbarity of their foes. Their virtuous citizens have born without repining, the loſs of many things which make life deſireable. Their brave troops have patiently endured the hardſhips and dangers of a ſituation, fruitful in both beyond former example.

The Congreſs, conſidering themſelves bound to love their enemies, as children of that Being who is equally the Father of all; and deſirous, ſince they could not prevent, at leaſt to alleviate the calamities of war, have ſtudied to ſpare thoſe who were in arms againſt them, and to lighten the chains of captivity.

The conduct of thoſe ſerving under the King of Great-Britain hath, with ſome few exceptions, been diametrically oppoſite. They have laid waſte the open country, burned the defenceleſs villages, and butchered the citizens of America. Their priſons have been the daughter-houſes of her ſoldiers, their ſhips of her ſeamen, and the ſevereſt injuries have been aggravated by the groſſeſt inſult.

Foiled in their vain attempt to ſubjugate the unconquerable ſpirit of freedom, they have meanly aſſailed the Repreſentatives of America with bribes, with deceit and the ſervility of adulation. They have made a mock of humanity, by the wanton deſtruction of men: They have made a mock of religion, by impious appeals to God whilſt in the violation of his ſacred commands: They have made a mock even of reaſon itſelf, by endeavouring to prove, that the liberty and happineſs of America could ſafely be entruſted to thoſe who have ſold their own, unawed by the ſenſe of virtue or of ſhame.

Treated with the contempt which ſuch conduct deſerved, they have applied to individuals: They have ſolicited them to break the bonds of allegiance, and imbrue their ſouls with the blackeſt of crimes: But fearing that none could be found through theſe United States, equal to the wickedneſs of their purpoſe, to influence weak minds they have threatened more wide deſtruction.

While the ſhadow of hope remained, that our enemies could be taught by our example to reſpect thoſe laws which are held ſacred among civilized nations, and to comply with the dictates of a religion which they pretend in common with us to believe and to revere, they have been left to the influence of that religion, and that example. But ſince their incorrigible diſpoſitions cannot be touched by kindneſs and the paſſion, it becomes our duty by other means to vindicate the rights of humanity.

We therefore, the Congreſs of the United States of America, Do ſolemnly declare, and proclaim, That if our enemies preſume to execute their threats, or perſiſt in their preſent career of barbarity, we will take ſuch exemplary vengeance as ſhall deter others from a like conduct. We appeal to that God who ſearcheth the hearts of men for the rectitude of our intentions. And in his holy preſence we declare, That as we are not moved by any light and haſty ſuggeſtions of anger or revenge, ſo through every poſſible change of fortune we will adhere to this our determination.

DONE in Congreſs, by unanimous conſent, the Thirtieth day of October, One Thouſand Seven Hundred and Seventy-eight.

HENRY LAURENS, Preſident.

Atteſt. CHARLES THOMSON, Secretary,

CONGRESS'S MANIFESTO IN RESPONSE TO THE OVERTURES OF THE PEACE COMMISSIONERS, DATED OCTOBER 30, 1778

mation promising pardon to all who would return to their allegiance. To this promise they added threats. Hitherto, the English had "checked the extremes of war when they tended to distress a people still considered as our fellow subjects and to desolate a country shortly to become again a source of mutual advantage." Now, "the question is, how far Great Britain may by every means in her power destroy or render useless a connection contrived for her ruin and for the aggrandizement of France." These threats were issued without authority, Johnstone, Eden, Clinton, Carlisle. Rutledge, John Adams, Franklin.

Caricature of the Peace Commission of 1778

but they were prophetic. In October, the commissioners, disappointed and angry, sailed for home. It is difficult to avoid a surmise as to what would be the present status of the United States if Lord North had not been "too late" or if the rebellious continentals and their congress had been more pliant.

CHAPTER VI

NEW GOVERNMENTS, STATE AND CONFEDERATE

Congressional Recommendations

WHILE American soldiers were fighting in the field, American statesmen were laboring to set up new state governments in place of those that had been overturned. The beginnings of that work have already been described. In June, 1775, the continental congress advised Massachusetts to choose officers according to her ancient constitution, "to exercise the powers of government until a governor of His Majesty's appointment consent to govern the colony according to its charter." In November, it advised New Hampshire and South Carolina to form temporary governments and, in the following month, counseled Virginia likewise.

Colonial Action

Rhode Island and Connecticut continued existing governments under their charters. By July, Massachusetts was Colony of RHODE-ISLAND, 1774.

The Honorable
JOSEPH WANTON, Esq; Gov.

The Honorable
DARIUS SESSIONS, Esq; Deputy-Gov.

1. SAMUEL DYRE, Esq; Assistant.
2. PELEG BARKER, Esq; Assistant.
3. SOLOMON DROWN, Esq; Assistant.
4. DAVID HARRIS, Esq; Assistant.
5. JOHN ALMY, Esq; Assistant.
6. THOMAS WICKES, Esq; Assistant.
7. JONATHAN RANDALL, Esq; Assistant.
8. JOHN CONGDON, Esq; Assistant.
9. ROWLAND ROBINSON, Esq; Assistant.
10. WILLIAM RICHMOND, Esq; Assistant.

HENRY WARD, Esq; Secretary.
HENRY MARCHANT, Esq; Attorney-General.
JOSEPH CLARKE, Esq; General Treasurer.

Rhode Island Ballot for Colony Officers again working under the forms of her charter and the proclamation urging obedience to the new government closed with "God save the people!" instead of "God

1775
1776

South Carolina State Seal, adopted in 1776 save King George!" In New Hampshire, a congress met at Exeter and framed and adopted a "constitution" without submitting it to the people. In South Carolina, the procedure was equally undemocratic. Instead of calling "a full and free representation of the people," as congress advised, the provincial congress, which was far from being representative of the whole people, set up a constitution and then resolved themselves into an assembly. Virginia did not immediately act upon the recommendation given by congress, but a convention met on the sixth of May, 1776, at Williamsburg, instructed its delegates in congress

January 5, 1776

Red Hill, the Homestead of Patrick Henry

March 26

1776 to work for independence, provided a constitution, and 1784 elected state officers. Patrick Henry was chosen gov-
June 29 ernor and Edmund Randolph attorney-general. The new government at once went into operation.

More Colonial Action

July 2–8, 1777

After the congressional recommendation of the tenth of May, 1776, and the explanatory preamble of the fifteenth, the remaining colonies framed and adopted constitutions. Even Vermont took such action and applied for admission. In 1778, South Carolina remodeled her hastily shaped corner-stone. In 1778, the Massachusetts general court adopted a constitution that was rejected by the town-meetings in 1779. The next draft, prepared by a specially elected convention, was submitted to the people who, after long and careful scrutiny, adopted it in 1780. In New Hampshire, an amended constitution was rejected by the people in 1779. A new convention met in 1781; the constitution that it framed was discussed and amended, and finally ratified in 1784.

Written Frames of Government

Although written constitutions were then uncommon, every colony adopted such an instrument excepting Rhode Island and Connecticut, which had saved their royal charters. The explanation is simple. Almost every colony then had or had had a charter that served the purposes of a constitution. It was natural for the Revolutionary statesmen to substitute written constitutions authorized by the people in the place of charters granted by the king.

Their Legal Character

In most of the colonies, the first constitutions were framed by bodies not specifically authorized to do the work and the instruments thus framed were not submitted to the people for their acceptance or rejection. In fact, Massachusetts was the only state the first constitution of which was so framed and adopted. In the later sense of an instrument that can be amended only by some special procedure authorized by the authority from which it proceeds, some of them were not constitutions at all. For instance, the New Jersey constitution left the legislature free to alter any part of it except sections relating to religious freedom, annual elections, and trial by jury, and, in 1777, the legislature exercised this power and amended the instrument much as they might an ordinary statute. In South Carolina, the instruments of 1776 and 1778 were declared by the supreme court of the state to be merely acts of the general assembly which that body could amend at pleasure. Such instruments were frames of government rather than constitutions as we now understand that term. 1776 1780

Their Political Character

However undemocratic the manner of framing and adoption, it was assumed that these constitutions represented the will of the people. "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," said the declaration of independence; everywhere it was admitted that the people are the basis of all legitimate political authority. In preamble, special bill of rights, or in some other form, the rights and privileges of the people—freedom of speech, habeas corpus, trial by jury, right of petition, exemption from arbitrary search, etc.,—were carefully set forth in most of the constitutions. The exercise of many powers was strictly forbidden and, to prevent usurpation, a great variety of checks and balances was created.

The Executive

For generations, in most of the colonies, the royal or the proprietary governor had been the bête-noir of the people. In New England especially, a similar feeling of hostility to the king had been entertained and, among the Whigs, this hatred was now universal. It was natural, therefore, that the executive should be regarded as "a necessary evil, a demon to be bound." In eight states he was chosen by the legislatures and thus became their creature; in ten states his term of office was limited to a year; in only two states did he have a veto. In some states he was held in check by a council of which he was little more than the presiding officer. In some states the title "Governor" was so hated that the chief executive was called the "President;" in South Carolina, his title was "President and Commander-in-chief."

The Legislature

In the anxiety to curb the executive, some of the constitutions disregarded the theory of the division of powers

1776 about which there was so much talk and concentrated 1780 authority chiefly in the legislature. In most of the states this body was organized on the bicameral plan. The members of the upper house, usually called the "senate" or "legislative council," were in some states elected by the people, in others by the lower house, though in Maryland they were chosen by a special college of electors, a cumbersome device later adopted into the federal constitution. The lower house was variously known as "the house of delegates," "assembly," "house of assembly," "house of commons," and "house of representatives;" in some states it was a more democratic body than the upper house. In Virginia, all legislation had to originate in the lower house and the same limitation as regards money bills was general.

No Nobility

In nothing was the democratic tendency of the times more clearly shown than in the provisions against the establishment of a nobility or an hereditary class. "No man or set of men," declared the Virginia bill of rights and the North Carolina constitution, "are entitled to exclusive or separate emoluments or privileges from the community but in consideration of public services." Four states forbade the entailing of estates—"that chief support of hereditary aristocracy." The Virginia constitution did not mention the subject, but, under the leadership of Jefferson, the system was abolished by statute late in 1776. When Pendleton, one of the leaders of the aristocracy, urged that the eldest son be allowed at least a double share, Jefferson replied in substance: "Not till he can eat a double allowance of food and do a double allowance of work."

Suffrage Limitations

The new governments were, however, not thoroughly democratic. In every constitution that mentions the subject, the suffrage was limited by property or tax-paying qualifications and, in some, by religious tests also. "The new garments, as the old, derived their 'just powers' from the consent of the property-owners and the taxpayers, not the plain people." In Massachusetts and some other states, representation was based upon the number of taxpayers or freeholders or upon the amount of taxes paid, not upon the number of inhabitants. Eligibility to office was usually dependent on property and sometimes on religious qualifications. In North Carolina, for example, a member of the senate must own within the county he represented three hundred acres of land in fee; a member of the house of commons, not less than one hundred. In Maryland, a senator must be worth one thousand pounds current money; a member of the house of delegates, five hundred pounds. In Massachusetts, the governor must have a freehold in the state worth one thousand pounds and must "declare himself to be of the Christian religion." In New Hampshire, under the second constitution, the president of the council must be worth five hundred pounds and be a Protestant. 1776 1781

Are We a Nation?

During this period of making state constitutions, the central authority was exercised by the continental congress. A dispute concerning the nature of this body was long waged, but since the civil war it has been of almost purely academic interest. On the one hand, it has been contended that, during the period of the continental congress, each state was independent and that there was no nation in the true sense of the word. On the other hand, it has been contended, as Abraham Lincoln contended in his first inaugural address, that the Union is older than the states.

The Affirmative

The answer to the question depends largely upon the point of view; there are facts hard to reconcile with either theory. From the first moment of the existence of the continental congress, "there was," says Professor Burgess, "something more than thirteen local governments. There was a sovereignty, a state; not an idea simply or upon paper, but in fact and in organization." The continental congress, say these thinkers, was a revolutionary body, representing the revolutionary party throughout the country, not the states. This body fought the common battle, exercised most of the powers usually considered as sovereign, and upon its success or 1774 1781 failure depended the independence or subjection of America. In his commentaries on the national constitution, Story says that the congress came from "the people, acting directly in their primary sovereign capacity and without the intervention of the functionaries, to whom the ordinary powers of government were delegated."

The Negative

In commenting on Story's statement, Van Tyne says: "The facts are that delegates [to the first continental congress] from two colonies were chosen by the legislatures, elected by the people in the ordinary way for the ordinary purposes of law making. The delegates from Massachusetts, a third colony, were chosen by the lower house duly elected, with no special instructions to choose delegates to the Continental Congress. Georgia was not represented at all and in only six colonies were there special conventions or provincial congresses of the nature Story imagines them to have been. . . . The colonies sending delegates to the First Continental Congress no more coalesced into a national state by that act than did the colonies which sent delegates to the Albany Congress or the Stamp Act Congress." Seven of the delegations to the second continental congress were chosen by provincial congresses or conventions, but, "if the instructions to Congress meant anything, the delegates came together unauthorized by the people to act as a national government."

The Popular Idea

There can be little question that, then and later, the great majority of the people would have repudiated the idea that congress was a sovereign body and that the states were dependent; there was not among the people a general consciousness of nationality. On the other hand, viewed from the standpoint of what the congress really was rather than from what the people thought it was, congress was a true, but imperfect type of national government. Until the independence of the revolted colonies was recognized by the nations, all governmental authority therein was de facto only. The people acquiesced in the assumption by congress of sovereign powers and in this acquiescence lay the chief source of its authority. Had it been overthrown, no government established by the insurgents would ever have been recognized by the world at large as a government de jure. 1776 1777

Attempts at Confederation

A movement to create a central government with definite powers was begun as soon as it became evident that independence would be declared. On the day on which the committee for drafting the declaration of independence was appointed, it was resolved that another committee should be named "to prepare and digest the form of a confederation to be entered into between these colonies." The committee was appointed the next day and included Samuel Adams, John Dickinson, Edward Rutledge, and Roger Sherman. Before the end of the month, a plan drawn up by Dickinson was in the hands of the committee and, on the twelfth of July, it was reported to congress. Congress ordered a copy printed for each member and enjoined secrecy both as to the plan and the debates. The plan was considered for several weeks. Then, because congress was "pretty thin, and hurried with other business," and because of the defeats sustained by the American army and the uncertainties of the future, the subject was dropped for the time being.

June 11

Tendency toward Disintegration

There was, however, a growing recognition of the need of a more efficient general government and, on the eighth of April, 1777, congress resolved to consider the plan two days in every week "until it shall be wholly discussed." Meanwhile, many of the ablest members had entered the army or the state governments, or had failed of reëlection. "The continental congress and the currency are greatly depreciated," wrote Gouverneur Morris. By the fifteenth of November, when the final vote was taken, Samuel Adams was the only remaining member of the original committee. This dearth of statesmen in congress, joined with a growing spirit of local independence, proved fatal to all attempts to frame a strong government. Practically every change made in Dickinson's draft weakened the proposed central author-1777 ity. The tendency was toward separation rather than closer union, although to every thoughtful mind it was clear that such a tendency could lead only to disaster.

Back into Bondage

The expenses for war and the general welfare were to be paid from a common treasury supplied by the several states in proportion to the value of the lands "granted to or surveyed for any person." But congress had no authority to make the valuation and taxes were to be levied by the authority of the several states and under their direction. The thirteen sovereigns would not grant to congress a power that they had denied to George III. and the restriction that the United States should not levy a tax or impose duties was accepted without remark. "No one explained the distinction between a superior power wielded by an hereditary king in another hemisphere and a superior power that should be the chosen expression of the will and reason of the nation. The country had broken with the past in declaring independence; it went back into bondage to the past in forming its first constitution."

A Rope of Sand

Whatever may have been the nature of the government under the continental congress, there can be no question regarding that instituted by the articles of confederation. The new political organism was to be called "The United States of America" and the union was to be perpetual, but the second article expressly provided that "each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence." If there had ever been an American state in objective organization, it gave way when the new articles went into effect. True, the states did waive the exercise of some of their sovereign rights, but those rights were only delegated to a common agent. The states remained sovereign; the union was only an alliance. National authority could neither veto nor revise state legislation. The United States was left destitute even of the incidental authority needed to carry into effect the powers that were granted to it. The confederation was an attempt "to reconcile a partial sovereignty in the union with complete sovereignty in the states, to subvert a mathematical axiom by taking away a part and letting the whole remain." 1777

The Germ of Nationality

The fourth article provided that the free inhabitants of each state, "paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted," should be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of free citizens in the other states, and that each state should give full faith and credit to the records, acts, and judicial proceedings of the courts and magistrates of every other state. Herein lay the reality of the nascent union; the most significant gain for the new republic. The expression "The People of the United States" is not to be found in the articles of confederation, but, by the provisions of that instrument, free inhabitants became free citizens and all were made one people.

The National Revenue

Instead of the power to tax, the new government was permitted to make requisitions upon the states. The method of determining the quota of each occasioned another debate. On the thirteenth of October, 1777, congress voted down a motion that the share of each state should be determined by the value of all the property within the state, "except household goods and wearing apparel," after which it was proposed to exempt slaves from taxation. The vote came the next day, New Jersey determined the issue, and all property in human flesh and blood was exempted from taxation. It was the first division on the slavery question.

Representation

One of the hardest struggles was over the question of representation. In deference to the wishes of the smaller states it was finally decided that there should be absolute equality of states. Virginia, which claimed a domain that reached from the Atlantic to the Mississippi and the great lakes was to have no more votes than Rhode Island. Each state was to choose each year not fewer than two nor more than seven delegates whose expenses were to be met by the states sending them to congress.

The Authority of Congress

Congress was to have the sole and exclusive power to determine peace or war; to make treaties and alliances; to build and equip a navy; to grant letters of marque and reprisal in times of peace; to fix standards of weights 1777 and measures; to establish and regulate a postal service between the states; to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces in the service of the United States, to direct their operations and to appoint all naval officers and all officers of the land forces above those of regimental rank. It was authorized to do certain other things concerning which the reader is referred to the full text of the articles printed in the appendix to this volume.

Restrictions on Congress

The complete inefficiency of congress was assured by the rules prescribed for its procedure. It was to meet on the first Monday of each November. It was to elect its own president, but no one could hold the office more than one year in any period of three years. This restriction, together with a clause that forbade any man to sit in congress more than three years out of six, could not fail seriously to impede the development of national statesmen. All important questions concerning war, treaties, the appropriation of money, etc., required the assent of nine states. Other than to adjourn from day to day, congress could do nothing without the assent of the majority of the states. No amendment of the articles could be made unless first agreed to in congress and subsequently agreed to by the legislatures of all the states. This difficulty of amendment proved a temporary drag and an ultimate blessing. As the country drifted toward anarchy and it was found impossible to amend the articles, the people were forced into the destruction of the whole system.

The Impotence of Congress

Congress could not even exercise its enumerated powers unhampered. It was unable to prevent or to punish offenses against its own laws, or even to perform its own duties. It could decide territorial disputes between the states, but it could not compel either party to abide by its decision. It could make treaties with foreign states, but states and individuals might violate them with impunity. It could make requisitions upon the states for money, but it could not compel the states to pay the money; it could pledge the public faith but was left without effectual means for taking the public faith out of pawn. For the observance of the articles congress had no guarantee except the promise of the states, and that proved to be worthless. 1777 1781

Quibbling States

The articles of confederation were finally agreed to by congress on the fifteenth of November, 1777, but to give them validity the assent of every one of the thirteen legislatures was necessary. Little as the states were giving up, they interposed objection and delay. Some objected to the method for apportioning taxes and troops; many criticisms were made upon the phraseology. New Jersey desired a provision for the central regulation of foreign trade. South Carolina returned the articles to congress with the recommendation that inter-citizenship should be confined to white men, but by a decided vote congress refused to make the change suggested.

Western Lands

A more serious cause of delay was the dispute about the western territory. The king of England had fixed western boundaries to six of the states, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland. New York claimed to have no western boundary but was less stubborn than were some of the others. By virtue of sea-to-sea charters, the other six states had claimed to extend across the continent, but the treaty of 1763 and the transfer of Louisiana to Spain had forced them to move their "South Sea" up to the

JONATHAN TRUMBULL, Esq;
Governor and Commander in Chief in and over the State of CONNECTICUT.

A PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS the Legislature of this State, by their Resolutions passed at their Session holden at New-Haven, on the second Thursday of October last, did declare, that this State has the undoubted and exclusive right of jurisdiction and preemption to all the lands lying west of the State of Pennsylvania, and east of the river Mississippi, and extending throughout from the latitude 41 to latitude 42 north, by virtue of the charter granted by King Charles the IId to the late Colony, now State of Connecticut, bearing date the 23d day of April, A. D. 1662: Which claim and right they are determined to assert and maintain.

I DO therefore, at the desire and request of the said Legislature, hereby publish, proclaim and make known this their resolution, assertion and determination to all people whomsoever it may concern. And, I do also, by this my Proclamation, strictly forbid all persons whatever, from entering upon or settling within the territory so claimed and asserted, without special licence and authority therefor, first had and obtained from the General Assembly of this State; as they would, with to avoid the pains, penalties and forfeitures to which they may, in such case, expect to be exposed.

Given under my hand and seal, at Lebanon, in the State of Connecticut, this 15th day of November, Anno Domini 1783.

JONA. TRUMBULL.

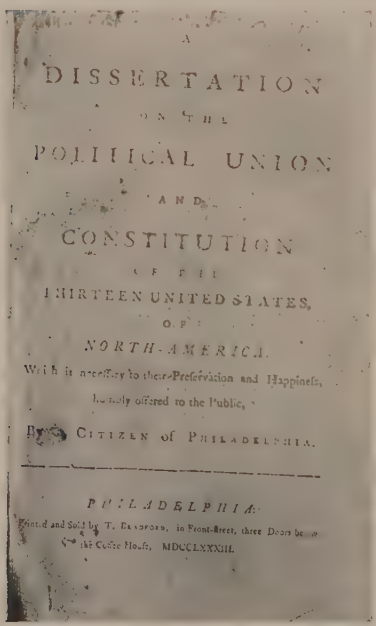

NEW-LONDON: Printed by T. GREEN, Printer to the Governor and Company

Proclamation by Jonathan Trumbull, Governor of Connecticut, relative to the Western Claims of that Colony

1777 Mississippi. Virginia also claimed the country north-
1781 west of the Ohio by virtue of the "west and northwest" clause of a charter that had been annulled for more than a century and a half, her claim thus overlapping those of Massachusetts and Connecticut. Without any hope of sharing in the western lands, the non-claimant states naturally saw a want of right and reason in the claims of the others. To them it seemed that when the king forbade the sale of lands beyond the Alleghenies and united that territory to Quebec he established western boundaries even for the states whose charters had not been annulled. Moreover, the western territory was to be won from the enemy by united action and the fruit of a common effort should be a common possession.

Ratification

In spite of these objections, the articles of confederation were signed, in July, 1778, by the delegates of all the states except New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland; New Jersey fell into line in the following November, and Delaware in May, 1779. Maryland, however, refused to sign until some satisfactory arrangement had been made regarding the western lands. In January, 1780, New York gave up her claims to all land west of the meridian of the extreme western end of Lake Ontario and congress urged similar action upon the other states. In January of the following year, Virginia, whose claim had been strengthened by the campaigns of George Rogers Clark, of which more hereafter, provisionally

A DISSERTATION
ON THE POLITICAL UNION
AND CONSTITUTION OF THE
THIRTEEN UNITED STATES
OF NORTH-AMERICA.
With is necessary to their Preservation and Happiness, humbly offered to the Public,
By a CITIZEN of PHILADELPHIA.
PHILADELPHIA:
Printed and Sold by T. BRADFORD, in Front-Street, three Doors below the Coffee House. MDCCLXXXIII.

Title-page of Pelatiah Webster's Pamphlet yielded her title to the territory northwest of the Ohio. Maryland then gave her delegates authority to sign the articles. They did so on the first of March, 1781, and thus completed the ratification. On the following day, the revolutionary congress met as the congress of the confederation. Six weeks later, James Madison proposed and Washington supported an amendment to give the United States power to employ the military and naval forces to compel delinquent states to fulfil their federal engagements and, in May, 1783, Pelatiah Webster published a pamphlet urging a federal convention for reconstructing the whole scheme of government. "In civil affairs, as much as in husbandry, seed-time goes before the harvest, and the harvest may be in the seed, the seed in the harvest."

1781 February 2

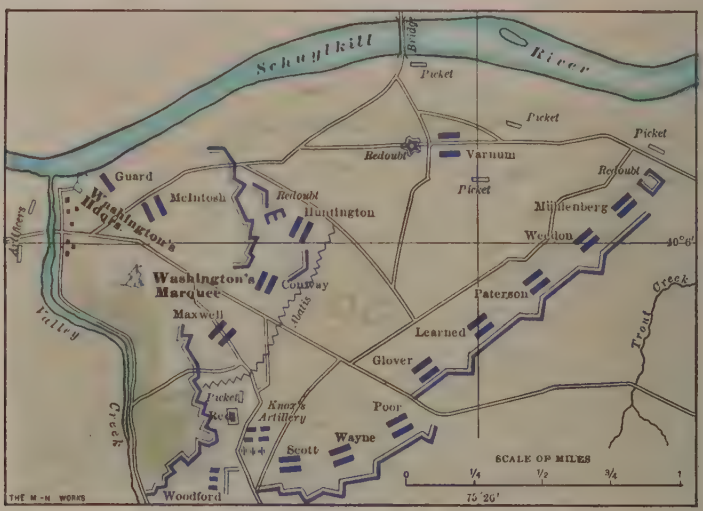

CHAPTER VII

VALLEY FORGE, MONMOUTH, AND NEWPORT

Camp and Costume

DURING the winter of 1777–78, Washington's little army lay among the wood-clad hills at Valley Forge. The log huts that the soldiers built were arranged in parallel streets, each brigade by itself, and gave the camp something of the appearance of a city. The window openings were closed with oiled paper and the cracks between the logs were chinked with wetted clay. On the twenty-third of December, the commander-in-chief reported that he had two thousand eight hundred and ninety-eight men "unfit for duty, because they are barefoot, and otherwise naked," and that, for lack of blankets, many were compelled "to sit up all night by fires, instead of taking comfortable rest in a natural and common way." Officers who were fortunate enough to have coats "had them of every color and make. I saw officers at a grand parade at Valley Forge, mounting guard in a sort of dressing gown made of an old blanket or woolen bed cover." On one occasion a party of aides-de-camp gave a supper to which no one who had a whole pair of breeches was admitted. "This," writes a foreign officer, "was of course understood as pars pro toto; but torn clothes were an indispensable requisite." The dinner was well attended.

Plan of Encampment at Valley Forge

1777
1778

BY Virtue of the Power and Direction to Me Specially given, I hereby enjoin and require all Persons residing within Seventy Miles of my Head Quarters to thresh out Half of their Grain by the 1st Day of February, on Pain, in Case of Failure, of having all that shall remain in Sheaves after the Period above mentioned, seized by the Commissaries and Quarter-Masters of the Army, and paid for as Straw.

GIVEN under my Hand, at Head Quarters, near the Valley Forge, in Philadelphia County, this 20th Day of December, 1777.

G. WASHINGTON.

By His Excellency's Command,
ROBERT H. HARRISON, Sec'y.

LANCASTER: Printed by JOHN DUNLAP.

Washington's Proclamation, issued at Valley Forge, December 20, 1777

Food and Frost

On the twenty-second of December, there was not "a single hoof of any kind to slaughter, and not more than twenty-five barrels of flour;" on the sixteenth of February, Washington wrote that part of the army had been "a week without any kind of flesh, and the rest three or four days." "No meat! no meat!" was the common cry of that dreadful winter. Meantime, there was much sickness, and many legs and arms were frozen and cut off. Horses starved to death by hundreds and, "without a murmur," the weakened troops, with tattered clothing and uncovered feet, did "patiently yoke themselves to little carriages of their own making, or load 1777 1778 their wood and provisions on their backs." As early as the twenty-third of December, Washington wrote that unless some "great and capital change" was quickly made the army would die of starvation or dissolve by desertion. Many of European nationality did desert, but, almost to a man, the native-born Americans remained. No wonder that the English historian, Trevelyan, says that this "bids fair to be the most celebrated encampment in the world's history." In all that history, there is no record of a heroism more sublime, a self-sacrifice more holy.

The Reason Why

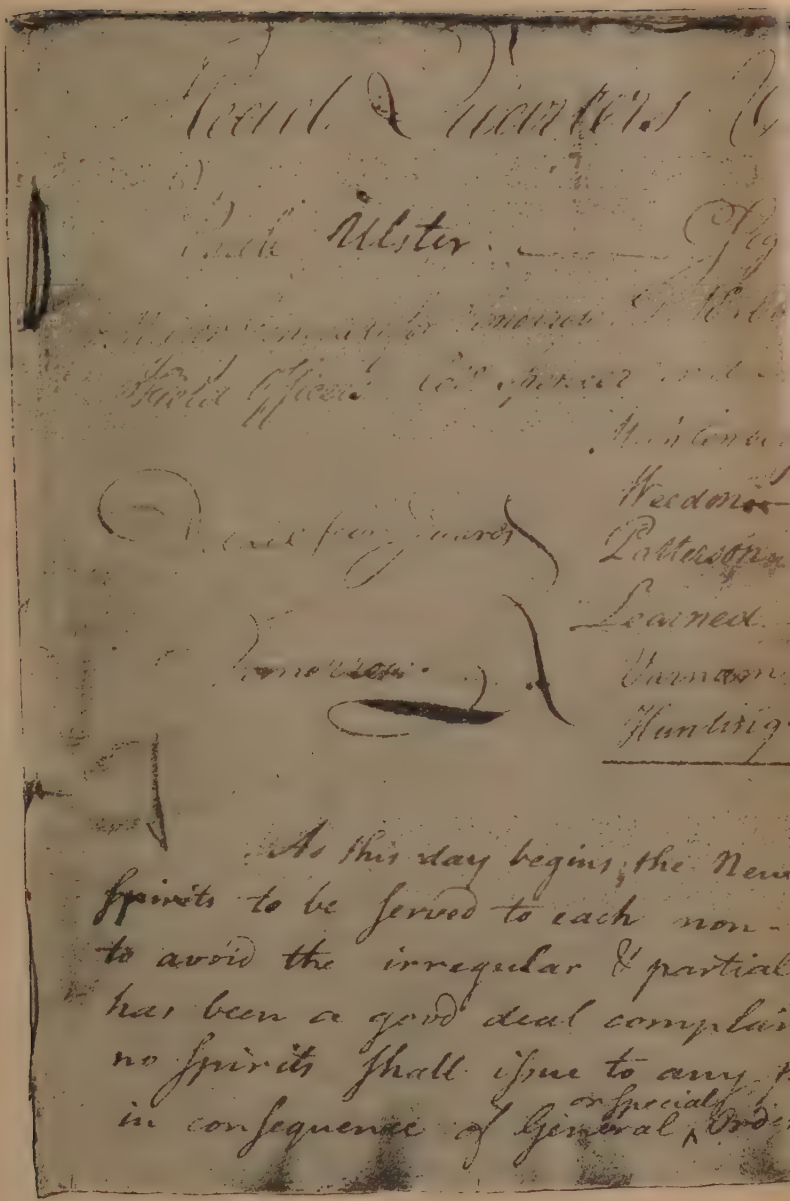

Much of this suffering was unnecessary; the trouble lay in the people and in the government. A large proportion of the well-to-do population was Tory in sentiment; of the rest, some were indifferent and more were unwilling to give their precious blood or their still more precious dollars for the cause of freedom. Having rebelled against taxation without representation, many had acquired a disinclination to pay any taxes at all. Congress, then in session at York, had degenerated into a "rump," attended during the last months of 1777 by sixteen or seventeen members and sometimes by only nine or ten. They attempted to perform administrative work with the result that everything was done ill. By their meddling in the summer of 1777, they forced the resignation of the efficient commissary-general, Colonel Joseph Trumbull, and that department fell into confusion. "Hogsheads of shoes, stockings, and clothing," are said to have been "lying at different places on the roads and in the woods, perishing for want of teams, or of money to pay the teamsters."

The Exchange of General Lee

In December, 1776, General Clinton sailed from New York with about three thousand men; on the ninth of that month, the British force landed at Newport. With Clinton was Major-general Prescott who, as if in imitation of the rashness of Major-general Lee at Baskinridge, took quarters at an unprotected farmhouse on the west side of the island, a mile from any troops. On the night of the twentieth of July, 1777, Lieutenant-colonel William Barton of the Rhode Island mili-

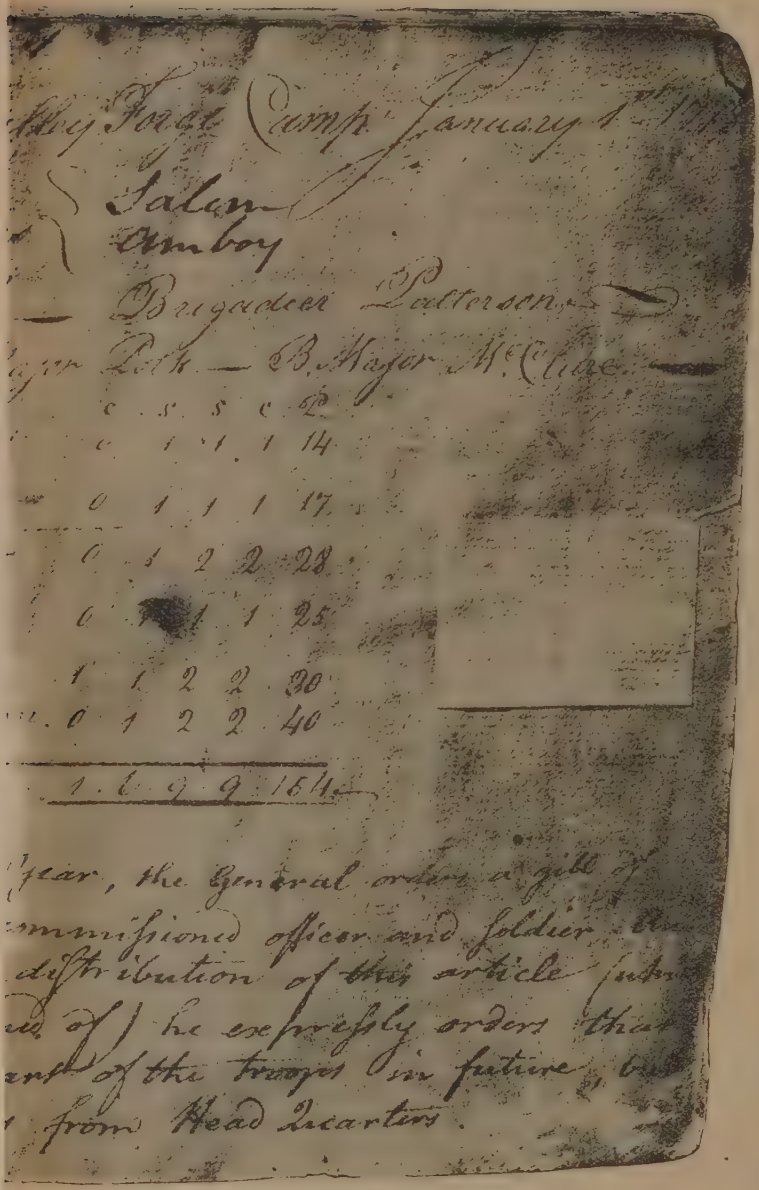

Autograph of William Barton

PAGE FROM BOOK OF "GENERAL ORDERS" KEPT AT TH

(Refers, among other things, to the issue of "a gill of spirits to be serv original order-book on file in the Adjutant-general'

CAMP AT VALLEY FORGE, DATED JANUARY 1, 1778 to each non-commissioned officer and soldier." Reproduced from office, War Department, Washington, D. C.)

1777
1778

tia, with forty volunteers, embarked in whaleboats, steered between the islands of Patience and Prudence, and landed at Redwood Creek. The guards were surprised, the door of Prescott's room was broken in by a negro who used his head as a battering-ram, and Prescott was taken out of his bed and borne off to Warwick whence he was sent to the American camp at Providence. On the twenty-first of April, 1778, Prescott was exchanged for Lee who had been paroled in March. On the twentieth of May, Lee rejoined the American army at Valley Forge.

House in which Prescott was Captured

American Uniforms, as depicted in Historisch-Genealogischer Calender oder Jahrbuch, Leipzic, 1784 (Facsimile copy by Harry A. Ogden)

Criticism and Detraction

While congress was allowing the army to starve, it was urging the commander-in-chief to drive the well-fed, well-intrenched, and more numerous British army

1777 from Philadelphia. Washington was constantly assailed
1778 because he played the part of Fabius Maximus. Benjamin Rush never tired of criticising him in private, while a delegate from Massachusetts declared that Washington's only idea of strategy was to collect troops for the purpose of wearing out stockings, shoes, and breeches. Even John Adams, who never appeared in the field, declared that he "was sick of Fabian systems" and "weary with so much insipidity." When the Pennsylvania legislature "thought fit to lecture him for returning into cantonments, amidst the luxuries of Valley Forge," Washington made the mild reply "that it is a much easier thing to draw remonstrances in a comfortable room, by a good fireside, than to occupy a cold bleak hill, and sleep under frost and snow without blankets."

Camp Bed used by George Washington at Valley Forge (Folded and Open)

Lady Washington

As usual, Mrs. Washington—"Lady Washington" she was always called in the army—passed the winter in camp with her husband who, at the close of each campaign, sent an aide to escort her to headquarters. A contemporary writer who met her at Philadelphia described her as "about forty or five-and-forty, rather plump, but fresh, and of an agreeable countenance." In this dreadful winter, she soothed the distresses of many, "extending relief wherever it was in her power and, with graceful deportment, presiding in the Chief's humble dwelling." The wives of other general officers followed the example of Mrs. Washington by joining their husbands in the winter camps.

The Conway Cabal

Thomas Conway was the decorated Irish colonel of a French regiment who had come to America and, as a brigadier-general, had taken part in the battles of Brandywine and Germantown. In the latter part of 1777 and in spite of Washington's disapproval, he was made a major-general and assigned to duty as inspector-general of the army, thus "jumping" several who were his seniors by commission. Embittered by Washington's opposition and endowed with a gift for making trouble, he became one of the leaders of "an intrigue which rumbled and spluttered below the surface of affairs all through that ill-famed winter." Just how definite the conspiracy was is a matter of doubt, but it is certain that a few aspiring and dissatisfied men like Conway, Gates, Mifflin, and the paroled Lee, desired to effect a change in the head of the army in the hope that it would inure to their benefit. Just who was to succeed Washington is also a matter of doubt. Most writers on the subject have assumed that Washington's successor would have been Gates, then fresh from Saratoga and laurel-crowned, but Lafayette always believed that Charles Lee was to have been the man. It is probable that the "conspirators" had not agreed on this point themselves and that there was no definite conspiracy; simply dissatisfaction and a willingness to get rid of Washington.

Martha Washington
(From Stuart's painting in the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston)

Autograph of Thomas Conway

A Blessing in Disguise

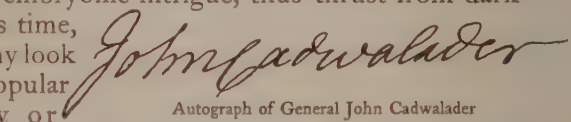

Through the influence of the dissatisfied, congress created a board of war and transferred to it some of the powers formerly exercised by the commander-in-chief. Gates was made president of the board; Wilkinson, of Gates's staff, was its secretary; and Mifflin was a member. For a time, it looked as though Washington's enemies were about to triumph, but, in December, when wine (or Monongahela whisky) was in and wit was out, Wilkinson revealed part of a letter written by Conway to Gates. The embryonic intrigue, thus thrust from darkness before its time, had an uncanny look and was not popular in the army or among the people. The "conspirators" quarreled among themselves and the plot, if there was a plot, completely failed. Washington's friends were soon in the ascendency in congress. Gates was removed from the board and given charge of the fortifications on the Hudson. Mifflin soon resigned his commission and entered congress. Conway resigned in March, was wounded in a duel with General Cadwalader in July, and soon returned to France. For many years, one of the most damaging accusations that could be made against a public man was a charge that he had been connected with "Conway's Cabal."

1777 1778 November, 1777

Baron Steuben, by Ralph Earle
(From original painting owned by Mrs. F. B. Austin of New York)

Autograph of General John Cadwalader

Steuben

In the dark days of that winter, there came to camp Baron Steuben, a veteran who had won honors in the Prussian service and had been an aide on the staff of the great Frederick. He sailed from Marseilles in September and reached Portsmouth, New Hampshire, on the first of December, 1777. Thence he wrote to congress that "the honor of serving a nation, engaged in the noble enterprise of defending its rights and liberties, was the motive that brought me to this continent." After reaching York where congress was in session, he proposed to enter the service as a volunteer with the understanding that congress would defray his necessary expenses. If the cause failed or his service proved unsatisfactory, he would expect nothing further; otherwise, he was to be refunded the income he had given up (about six hundred guineas per year) and properly remunerated. The offer was accepted and Steuben set out for Valley Forge where he arrived on the twenty-third of February. 1777 1778

Uniforms of American Riflemen and Pennsylvania Infantry, as depicted in Historisch-Genealogischer Calender oder Jahrbuch, Leipzic, 1784
(Facsimile copy by Harry A. Ogden)

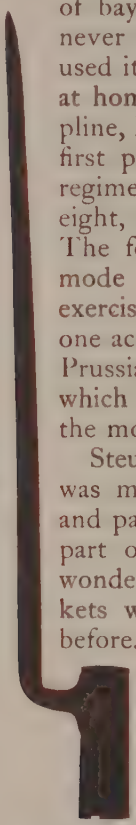

What Steuben Found

Steuben was astonished at the suffering of the troops and fully as much at their lack of discipline and proper organization. "I have seen," he wrote long afterward, "a regiment consisting of thirty men, and a company of one corporal. . . . We had more commissaries and quartermasters at that time than all the armies of Europe together." Five to eight thousand muskets were lost each year by the discharged

1778 soldiers carrying them home as souvenirs. "The loss of bayonets was still greater. The American soldier, never having used this arm, had no faith in it, and never used it but to roast his beefsteak, and indeed often left it at home. . . . With regard to their military discipline, I may safely say no such thing existed. In the first place there was no regular formation. A so-called regiment was formed of three platoons, another of five, eight, nine, and the Canadian regiment of twenty-one. The formation of the regiments was as varied as their mode of drill, which only consisted of the manual exercise. Each colonel had a system of his own, the one according to the English, the other according to the Prussian or French style. There was only one thing on which they were uniform. . . . They all adopted the mode of marching in files used by the Indians."

What Steuben Did

Steuben at once set to work as inspector; in May, he was made inspector-general of the army with the rank and pay of a major-general. In spite of jealousy on the part of some of the higher officers, he accomplished wonders. In the next year, not more than twenty muskets were lost instead of the thousands lost the year before. Most important of all, he turned drill sergeant and introduced a discipline that the troops had never known before. Rising at three in the morning, he would drink his coffee, smoke his pipe, and then gallop to the parade for a hard day's work. He even overcame the unwillingness of the higher regimental officers to drill their men and, when he first saw a colonel instructing a recruit, exclaimed: "I thank God for that!" At first, he was handicapped by his ignorance of English, but a Captain Walker who knew French became his interpreter. It is said that after he had learned a little English, he would occasionally be heard to cry out: "Viens, mon ami Walker, viens, mon bon ami. Sacre-bleu! Gott-vertamn de gaucherie of dese badauds. Je ne puis plus; I can curse dem no more!" But his earnestness and good sense triumphed over all difficulties. The good effects of his work were seen in the next campaign, notably at Monmouth where these lately awkward troops maneuvered with coolness and precision and rallied like veterans. 1777 1778

Bayonet of Revolutionary Time

When Howe's army entered Philadelphia, they found many unoccupied dwellings and stores. The British troops were well housed, comfortably clothed, and well fed. The activities of war were largely suspended and the soldiery "killed time" at theatre, dance-house, cock- The British Occupation of Philadelphia pit, or gambling-den. Clubs met at the public houses and weekly balls were held at the City Tavern. The officers were quartered on the people. Many of these were gentlemen of education and refinement who "treated their civilian hosts with consideration and friendliness." Others imitated the conduct of the genial but immoral General Howe and shocked the people by their doings.

British Defenses at Philadelphia

The winter was the gayest that the Quaker capital had ever known and the season closed with a gorgeous spectacle, the occasion for which was the departure of General Howe for England. Finding that the ministry would not send out reinforcements, Howe had asked to be recalled. Lord George Germain had taken him at his word and, on the eighth of May, 1778, Sir Henry Clinton arrived as Howe's successor. The officers and men regretted Howe's departure and preparations were made Clinton Succeeds Howe

November, 1777

1778 for a great demonstration in his honor. Triumphal arches and lists and barriers were erected; scenery and gorgeous costumes were provided. The ceremonies

May 18 began with a grand regatta on the river. Then followed

"A Picturesque View of the State of Great Britain for 1778"

EXPLANATION

I. The Commerce of Great Britain, represented in the figure of a Milch Cow.
II. The American Congress sawing of her horns which are her natural strength and defence: the one being already gone, the other just a going.
III. The jolly, plump Dutchman milking the poor tame Cow with great glee.
IV. & V. The French and Spaniard, each catching at their respective shares of the produce, and running away with bowls brimming full, laughing to one another at their success.
VI. The good ship Eagle laid up, and moved at some distance from Philadelphia, without sails or guns, and shewing nothing but naked portholes; all the rest of the fleet invisible, nobody knows where.
VII. The two Brothers napping it; one against the other, in the City of Philadelphia, out of sight of fleet and Army.
VIII. The British Lion lying on the ground fast a sleep, so that a pug-dog tramples upon him, as on a lifeless log: he seems to see nothing, hear nothing, and feel nothing.
IX. A free Englishman in mourning, standing by him, wringing his hands, casting up his Eyes in despondency and despair, but unable to rouse the Lion to correct all these invaders of his Royal Prerogative and his subjects' property.

a mock tournament in which six knights of the "Blended Rose" and six of the "Burning Mountain" jousted before an American and an English "Queen of Beauty." The day ended with fireworks, a grand ball, and a midnight supper. This "Mischianza," as it was called, has for us an added interest by reason of the fact that two of the participants were Captain André and Peggy Shippen, the latter soon to be the wife of Benedict Arnold. A few days after the grand fête in his honor, and close on the heels of his failure to capture Lafayette and his detachment at Barren Hill, on the Schuylkill about midway between Valley Forge and Philadelphia, Howe turned over his command to Clinton and sailed for England. 1778

May 24

The Grand Exodus

John André

Made "from a drawing by Sir Joshua Reynolds in possession of Thomas Addis Emmet, M. D."

As a powerful French fleet was crossing the Atlantic, there was danger that Philadelphia might be blockaded and it soon became known that the city was to be evacuated. The heavy ordnance and part of the baggage of the British army were packed on board the British fleet in the river. Three thousand Tories who had gone too far safely to trust themselves to the mercies of their countrymen embarked with what goods they could save. On the eighteenth of June, the British fleet dropped down the river and the British army crossed into New Jersey. "They did not go away; they vanished."

Peggy Shippen

The Americans in Pursuit

Washington had foreseen the movement and had sent Maxwell with the New Jersey troops to coöperate with Dickinson and the militia in destroying bridges and delaying the advance of the enemy. The news of the evacuation of the city reached Valley Forge

1778 the same day. Everything was in readiness and the pursuit was at once begun. Arnold, whose wound would not allow him to take the field, was sent to occupy Philadelphia; on the twenty-second, Washington crossed the Delaware at Coryells Ferry (now Lambertville) about forty miles above the city. Clinton had about fourteen thousand effective men and a train twelve miles long. This train carried about everything that could be piled on wagons — luggage and plunder, servants, women, and "every kind of other useless stuff." Rains had made the roads wretched, many of the bridges had been destroyed, the heat was oppressive, the advance of the British army was slow, and the Americans soon came within striking distance. On the twenty-fourth, Washington held a council of war at Hopewell. General Lee opposed any attack, declaring that it would be better to build a bridge of gold for the retreating enemy. He carried a majority of the council with him, but Lafayette, Wayne, Greene, and Steuben advocated an aggressive course and Washington overruled the council. Brigadier Scott was sent with fifteen hundred men to reinforce Maxwell and Morgan who were hanging on the British left flank. Washington advanced to Kingston with the intention of attacking Clinton if he should try to pass the Raritan, but the British general turned to the eastward. Wayne was sent with a thousand men to join the advance the command of which was held by Lafayette, it having been declined by Lee. But Lee soon changed his mind and pleaded with both Washington and Lafayette to be given the command. In an unlucky hour, Washington consented and sent Lee forward with two more brigades, thus bringing the total strength of the advance up to about five thousand men. 1778 June 26

Lafayette at Barren Hill

The Strange Conduct of General Lee

On the night of the twenty-seventh, Clinton's army lay encamped not far from Monmouth Court House (Freehold). General Lee's force was about five miles to the northwest, not far from Englishtown, and Washington with the main American army was within supporting distance. At sunrise of Sunday, the twenty-eighth, Knyphausen, in charge of the British baggage train, took up his march toward Middletown and, at eight o'clock, Clinton followed. Lee had orders to attack the British left wing; Washington was to come up with the main army and support him. Although Lee dallied, he finally came in sight of the enemy. By Clinton's order, Cornwallis quickly formed a line of battle and advanced to the attack. What followed is difficult to understand or tell. Through treachery, obstinacy, or cowardice, Lee issued some very astonishing and confused orders; the American troops began to fall back; after a slight engagement, their retreat became disorderly.

Washington Hastens to the Front

Washington was hastening to support the attack when he met fugitives who said that Lee's detachment was retreating. Filled with painful suspicions, Washington spurred his horse toward the front. The straggling current grew momentarily; colonels and generals with broken commands were soon met; all knew that they were retreating but no one could tell why. Crossing what was 1778 called the west ravine, Washington posted, on the left, the regiments of Ramsey and Stewart with two cannons to check the enemy until a line of battle could be formed. On the right, back of an orchard and protected by a hedge, he posted the commands of Varnum, Wayne, and Livingston and there Knox and Oswald placed four guns. Lafayette was ordered to draw up a second line. As the other generals arrived, they were ordered to the rear to reform their lines. "It was such an hour as tests great captains and proves soldiers."

Map of Battle of Monmouth

The Battle of Monmouth

Just then General Lee appeared with the last retreating column. Accounts differ as to the interview that followed, but there is no doubt that Washington was very angry and peremptorily demanded the cause of the retreat; there is a story that he called Lee "a damned poltroon." Washington brought up the main army and Lee soon withdrew from the field. Now appeared the good effects of Steuben's work. The new lines were hastily formed with Greene on the right and Stirling on the left; after a warm conflict, the British were driven back; darkness put an end to the struggle. In the day, the temperature had risen to ninety-six degrees in the shade and many on both sides fell dead without a wound.

Clinton, having realized every possible benefit from his return to the offensive, left his dead unburied, quietly withdrew at midnight, and reached New York without further molestation. After resting his troops for a few days at Brunswick, Washington followed to the Hudson; on the twenty-second of July, he reëstablished his headquarters at White Plains. Washington reported his loss at three hundred and sixty-two, but some of the missing had been overcome by the fatigue and heat and afterwards rejoined the army. Among those thus overcome was an artillery sergeant, John Hays, whose German wife, Mary, had shared with him the privations and dangers of march, bivouac, and battle. When the husband fell, the wife took his place at the gun, and, after the conflict, assisted in carrying water to the wounded. This latter service won for her the nom de guerre of "Moll Pitcher," and thus she is known in history. The British loss was more than four hundred, in addition to many desertions on the march and prostrations by the heat.

1778

Table on which Moll Pitcher told Fortunes during the American Revolution

Moll Pitcher
(Bronze Tablet on Monmouth Battle Monument)

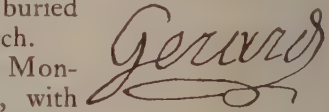

The battle of Monmouth, the last general engagement fought in the North, put an end to the military career of Charles Lee. Lee's letter to Washington demanding an explanation of the pungent language addressed to him on the battle-field brought on a court martial that found Lee guilty "of disobedience of orders in not attacking the enemy on the twenty-eighth of June, agreeable to repeated instructions, of misbehavior before the enemy, by making an unnecessary, and in some 1778 few instances a disorderly retreat; and of disrespect to the Commander-in-Chief." He was suspended from command for a year; in a duel with Colonel John Laurens, one of Washington's aides, he was wounded in the arm. Before the expiration of his term of suspension he addressed an impudent letter to congress and was dismissed from the army. He retired in disgrace to his estate in the Shenandoah valley with the innuendo that he had discovered that it was necessary to learn to hoe tobacco in order to become a successful general in America. He died in Philadelphia in 1782 and was buried in the cemetery of Christ Church.

The End of General Lee

Count d'Estaing

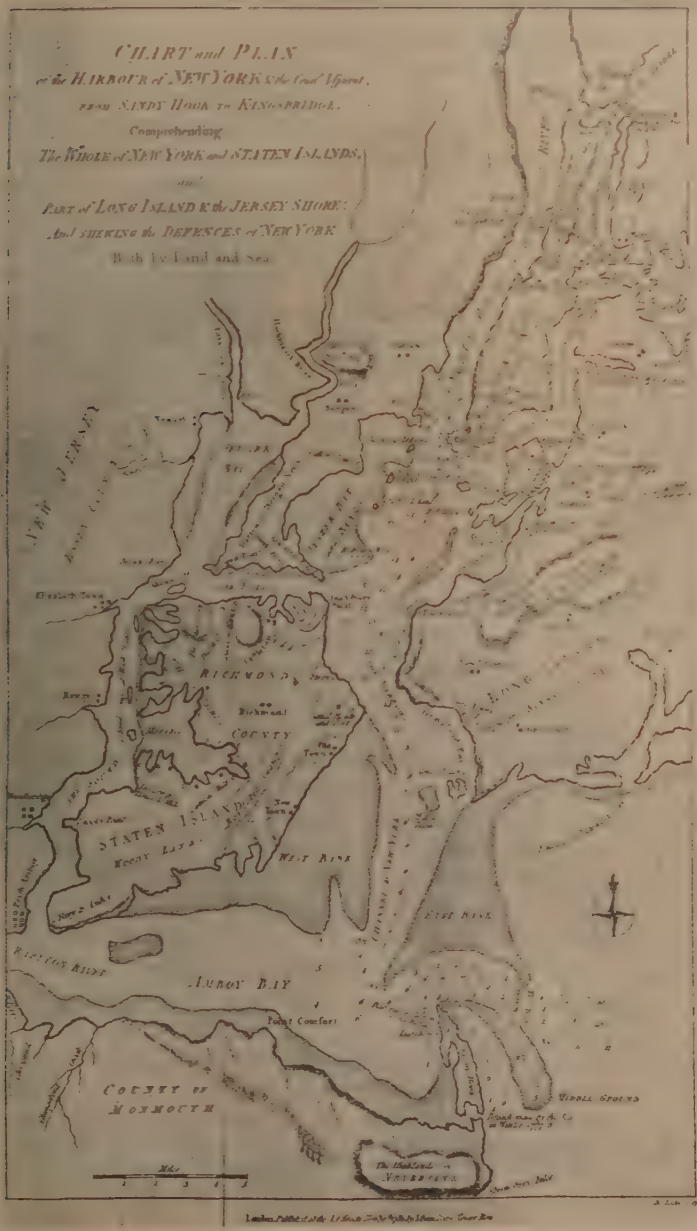

Autograph of Gerard

The French Fleet

Nine days after the battle of Monmouth, the count d'Estaing, with twelve ships of the line and six frigates, having on board four thousand troops, M. Gerard,

View of Newport in 1730

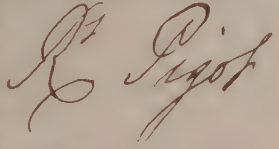

MAP OF THE HARBOR OF NEW YORK IN 1781

(Published by J. Bew, London, 1781; reproduced from copy in the New York Public Library, Lenox Building) the first minister to the new republic, and Silas Deane, arrived off the mouth of the Delaware — too late to catch Lord Howe's squadron. After landing his distinguished passengers, d'Estaing sailed northward to Sandy Hook and, after a conference with Hamilton and Laurens of Washington's staff, decided to enter New York harbor and destroy the British fleet. As the pilots reported that his largest vessels could not cross the bar, the enterprise was abandoned and arrangements were made for a combined attack on Newport, which, since December, 1776, had been in British hands. 1778

Great preparations were made for the intended movement. General Sullivan, who had been at Providence since April, was placed in command of the American forces. Washington sent Lafayette and Greene and about two thousand men to reinforce him, and the New England militia swelled his force to nine or ten thousand. With the four thousand troops on board the French fleet, the allies thus had thirteen or fourteen thousand men with which to attack General Pigot, the British commander, and his six thousand. But everything was mismanaged. When the French arrived, much of the American army was, in d'Estaing's expressive phrase, "still at home" and Sullivan would not agree to an earlier date for the attack than the tenth of August. But, finding that the British had withdrawn from the north end of the island, he crossed over on the ninth and thus aroused the resentment of his allies. The French began to disembark on Conanicut Island when Lord Howe arrived off the bay with thirteen or fourteen ships of the line, seven frigates, and some smaller vessels. Afraid of being caught at a disadvantage, d'Estaing hastily reëmbarked his troops and sailed out to meet the British ships. Just as the fleets were about to engage, a terrific storm burst upon them, dispersing and shattering both. When the storm had abated, Sullivan advanced with his whole army, threw up intrenchments, and, for

The Siege of Newport

Autograph of Robert Pigot

August 9

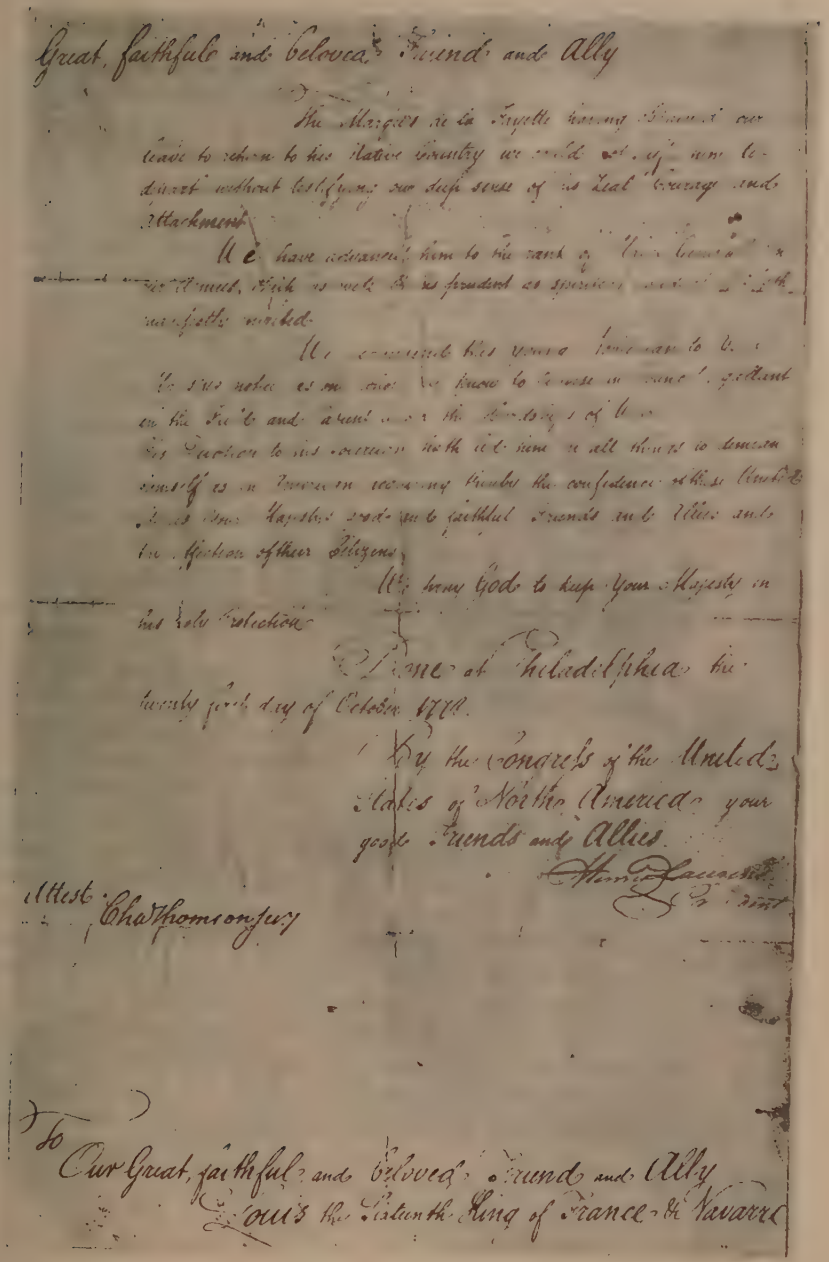

August 10

August 15

1778 five days, kept up a heavy cannonade. The French fleet returned on the twentieth to the great joy of the besieging army, but d'Estaing insisted upon going to Boston to refit and sailed at nightfall of the twenty-first, quickly followed by a protest against his departure at such a crisis, a protest that was drawn up by the American officers and that Lafayette refused to sign. The siege was, however, pressed with vigor and, by the twenty-seventh, the British had abandoned all their outworks except one. But there was great dissatisfaction in the American camp, desertions became frequent, the militia began to swarm off home, and half of the New Hampshire volunteers had gone when, on the twenty-eighth, a council determined to fall back to the fortified hills at the northern end of the island and there to await the return of the French fleet. The retreat began in the evening and, before morning, the army encamped on Butts Hill.

Map of Siege of Newport

Great, faithful and beloved Friend and Ally

The Marquis de la Fayette having desired our leave to return to his native country we could not refuse him this request without testifying our deep sense of his zeal, courage and attachment.

We have advanced him to the rank of Major General in our armies, which we hope will be pleasing to your Majesty, as it was unsolicited by him.

We recommend this young nobleman to your Majesty's notice as one who has left his home to cross the seas, and to risk his life in the cause we are engaged in, from the purest motives.

Your Majesty will do him justice in all things as to a person who has merited our esteem, and we pray God to keep your Majesty in his holy protection.

Done at Philadelphia the twenty fifth day of October 1779.

By the Congress of the United States of North America your good Friends and Allies.

Henry Laurens President

Attest Chas Thomson Secy

To Our Great, faithful and beloved Friend and Ally Louis the Sixteenth King of France & Navarre

LETTER OF RECOMMENDATION OF LAFAYETTE FROM THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES TO THE KING OF FRANCE

(From original document at the New York Historical Society)

Early the next day, two British columns marched along the two roads that led northward and began an attack. A few British war-ships came up the bay and opened fire upon the American right. For nearly seven hours the battle raged with fearful carnage. In repelling the furious and repeated onsets of the Hessians, "the newly raised black regiment under Col. [Christopher] Greene distinguished itself by deeds of desperate valor." At last, the British retired to their fortified camp on Quaker Hill, where Sullivan desired to attack them. But the American troops had been without rest or food for thirty-six hours, the assault was abandoned, and both armies went into camp. On the morning of the thirtieth, Sullivan received word from Washington of the coming of Lord Howe's fleet with Sir Henry Clinton and five thousand troops, and heard from Boston that d'Estaing could not return as soon as had been expected, and a council of officers resolved on withdrawing the American army from the island. A cannonade kept up all day on both sides, the tents were struck at dark, and, by midnight, the main army had crossed the ferry to Tiverton. On the morning of the thirty-first, the British fleet with Clinton's army arrived at Newport.

1778 August 29

The failure of the siege of Newport, of which much had been expected, aroused great indignation against the French and, for a time, threatened the stability of the alliance. Although the failure was due as much to his slowness as to any fault of the French, Sullivan issued an intemperate general order reflecting on his allies. Congress passed resolutions approving d'Estaing's course, and Washington did what he could to allay the angry feelings of both sides. The people, however, refused to look at the matter temperately and, when d'Estaing issued a proclamation to the Canadians calling upon them to return to their old allegiance, criticism broke out anew. In November, the French fleet sailed for the West Indies.

Bad Blood

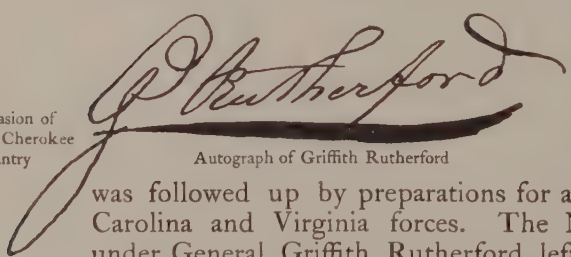

CHAPTER VIII

BORDER WARFARE AND THE CONQUEST OF THE NORTHWEST

On the Southern Frontier

THE Cherokees had not forgotten and, incited by British agents, again took up the hatchet. Early in July, 1776, their war-parties rushed down from the upland fastnesses, and the back-country settlements from southwestern Virginia to northwestern Georgia were wrapped in the horrors of barbarian warfare. Many of the settlers were slain and others took refuge in the stockade forts from which they beat back the foe. The Watauga settlers were the most exposed, but they received timely warning, retired into their stockades, and defended themselves successfully. In South Carolina, a force of Indians and Tories under a British agent named Cameron ravaged the border and ambushed a force under Colonel Andrew Williamson on Oconoree Creek, but was driven off. By the middle of August, Williamson had destroyed the Cherokee lower towns; owing to lack of provisions, he was unable to march against the upper towns.

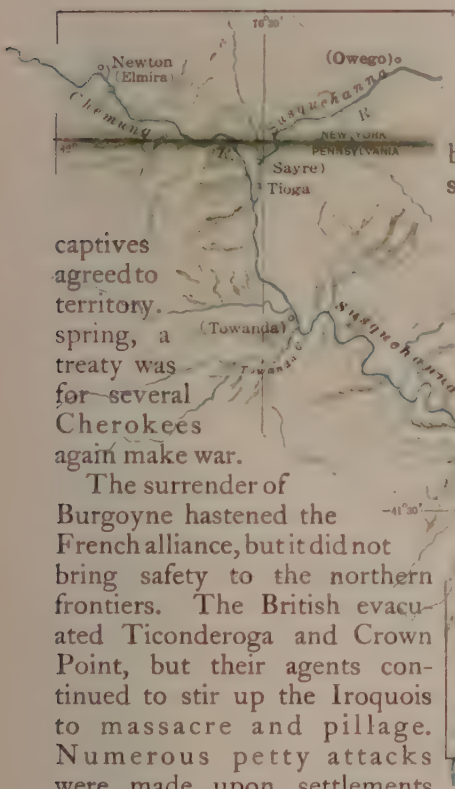

Autograph of Griffith Rutherford

Invasion of the Cherokee Country

This success was followed up by preparations for a joint invasion by Carolina and Virginia forces. The North Carolinians under General Griffith Rutherford left the head of the Catawba about the first of September, crossed the Blue Ridge at Swananoa Gap, forded the French Broad, and destroyed the middle towns. In the same month, the South Carolinians under Williamson pushed up War Woman's Creek, passed through Rabun Gap, and, with the aid of Rutherford's command, succeeded in laying waste the towns along the Hiawassee. The Virginia army, including men from the Watauga region and some from North Carolina, rendezvoused at Great Island in the Holston and, led by Colonel William Christian, reached the overhill towns early in November. For two weeks, cabins were burned and crops destroyed. The Cherokees gave up the horses and captives they had taken and agreed to cede some of their territory. In the ensuing spring, a more formal treaty was made and, for several years, the Cherokees did not again make war.

1776
1777

Map of Wyoming

The Wyoming Massacre

The surrender of Burgoyne hastened the French alliance, but it did not bring safety to the northern frontiers. The British evacuated Ticonderoga and Crown Point, but their agents continued to stir up the Iroquois to massacre and pillage. Numerous petty attacks were made upon settlements in New York and, in June, 1778, Colonel John Butler gathered a force of Tories and Iroquois, chiefly Senecas, under a chief known as Old King, for an attack upon the Connecticut settlers in the valley of Wyoming.

1778 In canoes they floated down the Chemung and the Susquehanna. Butler made his headquarters at a deserted stockade known as Wintermoot's Fort and sent out marauding parties to plunder and lay waste the country. Many of the settlers gathered in a stockade known as Forty Fort, just above the present town of Wilkesbarre, whence Colonel Zebulon Butler with about three hundred volunteers sallied out hoping to surprise Fort Wintermoot; they found an outnumbering enemy drawn up on ground of their own choosing. The ensuing conflict lasted about an hour, and the British Butler reported five prisoners and "two hundred and twenty-seven" scalps taken. Forty Fort surrendered and the upper Wyoming valley was transformed into a scene of desolation. The Indians revelled in bloody massacre and dreadful orgies, and the Tories were not less inhuman.

Forty Fort

July 3

Wyoming Massacre Monument

Cherry Valley

November 11

In November, the enemy, under the leadership of Walter Butler, Old King, and Joseph Brant, made an attack upon the little village of Cherry Valley in central New York. The village was taken, sixteen soldiers were killed, and about thirty-two persons were massacred. The dwellings and barns were burned, but the fort was suc-

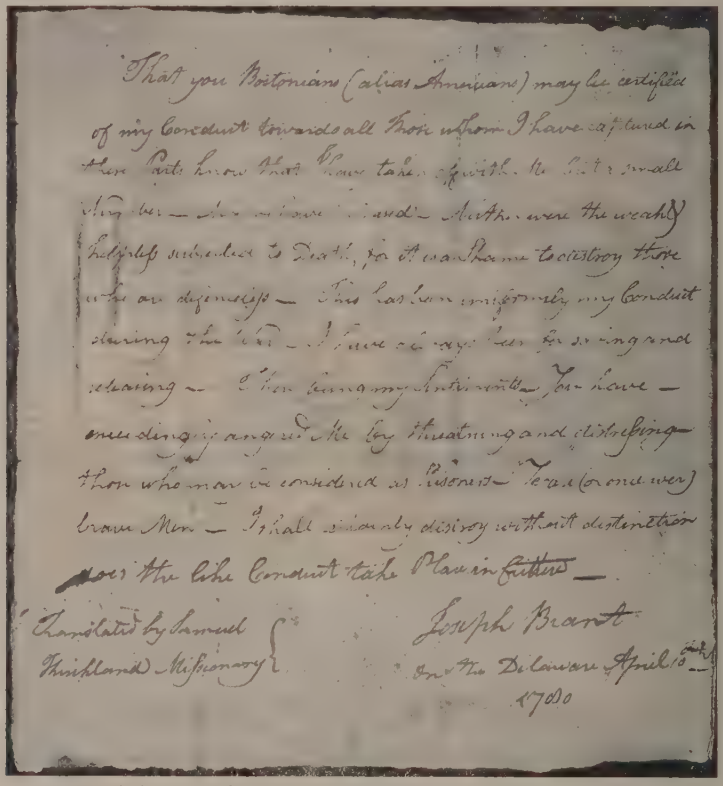

MAP OF INDIAN OPERATIONS IN THE EAST

Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, Military Academy, West Point, N. Y., and David Maydole Matteson, A. M., Cambridge, Mass.

1779 cessfully defended. There were other Indian outrages that year, but none of them made an impression as deep as did the massacres at Wyoming and Cherry Valley.

The Sullivan Expedition

These atrocities provoked retaliation. In August, 1779, three expeditions entered the Iroquois country.

That you Britonians (alias Americans) may be certified of my Conduct towards all those whom I have captured in the Path I now take with the Sword in my hand — those whom I have saved — And those were the weakly helpless subdued to Death, for it was Shame to destroy those who are defenceless — This has been uniformly my Conduct during the War — I have always been for saving and rescuing — Then turning my Sentiments to you I have — encouraging and Me by threatning and distressing those who may be considered as Prisoners — Tear (or one wer) brave Men — I shall similarly destroy without distinction all the like Conduct take Place in future —

Translated by Samuel Kirkland Missionary

Joseph Brant
On the Delaware April 10th
1780

Brant's Letter, April 10, 1780, translated by Reverend Samuel Kirkland
(From original document loaned by S. L. Frey)

Colonel Daniel Brodhead with about six hundred men ascended the Allegheny River from Pittsburg and destroyed several Indian towns about the head-waters of that stream. Brigadier-general James Clinton with from twelve to sixteen hundred men moved up the Mohawk and thence across to the head-waters of the Susquehanna and then down that stream. The third detachment, under Major-general Sullivan who had general command of the campaign, consisted of about twenty-five hundred men and advanced up the Susquehanna. Sullivan's and Clinton's forces met at Tioga, and, a week later, defeated a force of from eight to fifteen hundred Indians and Tories at Newton (Elmira). Sullivan laid waste the country of the Senecas and Cayugas, burned more than forty villages, destroyed the standing corn, and cut down all the fruit-trees, a vengeance more terrible than any that had fallen on them since the days of Frontenac. By October, Sullivan's army was back in New Jersey after a march of more than seven hundred miles. The following winter was one of the severest on record and the homeless Indians suffered much from cold, famine, and pestilence.

1779

August 22

General John Sullivan
(From Tenney's painting in the State House, Concord, New Hampshire)

Heavy as was the blow thus dealt, it did not bring safety to the border. Brant still held the stronghold at Niagara and, in the following winter, he fell upon and punished the Oneidas who had remained at peace with the Americans; for two years barbarian bands continued to ravage the frontier, particularly in the valleys of the Mohawk, the Scoharie, the upper Connecticut, and about Lake Champlain. Tryon County was almost depopulated.

A Reign of Terror

1776
1777

The Hair Buyer

Thanks to the effect of Dunmore's war, Kentucky remained for two years free from an Indian uprising, but British agents were encouraging the Indians to engage in hostilities and serious warfare was at hand. The northwestern tribes held great councils at Detroit, some of which were summoned by Henry Hamilton, the British lieutenant-governor of the Northwest, a bold, ambitious, unscrupulous man who became greatly hated on the border as the "hair buyer." Whether or not he personally purchased scalps is in dispute, but he stirred up the Indians to make war upon the settlers with the result that scalps were taken and every form of atrocity that red fiends could devise was perpetrated.

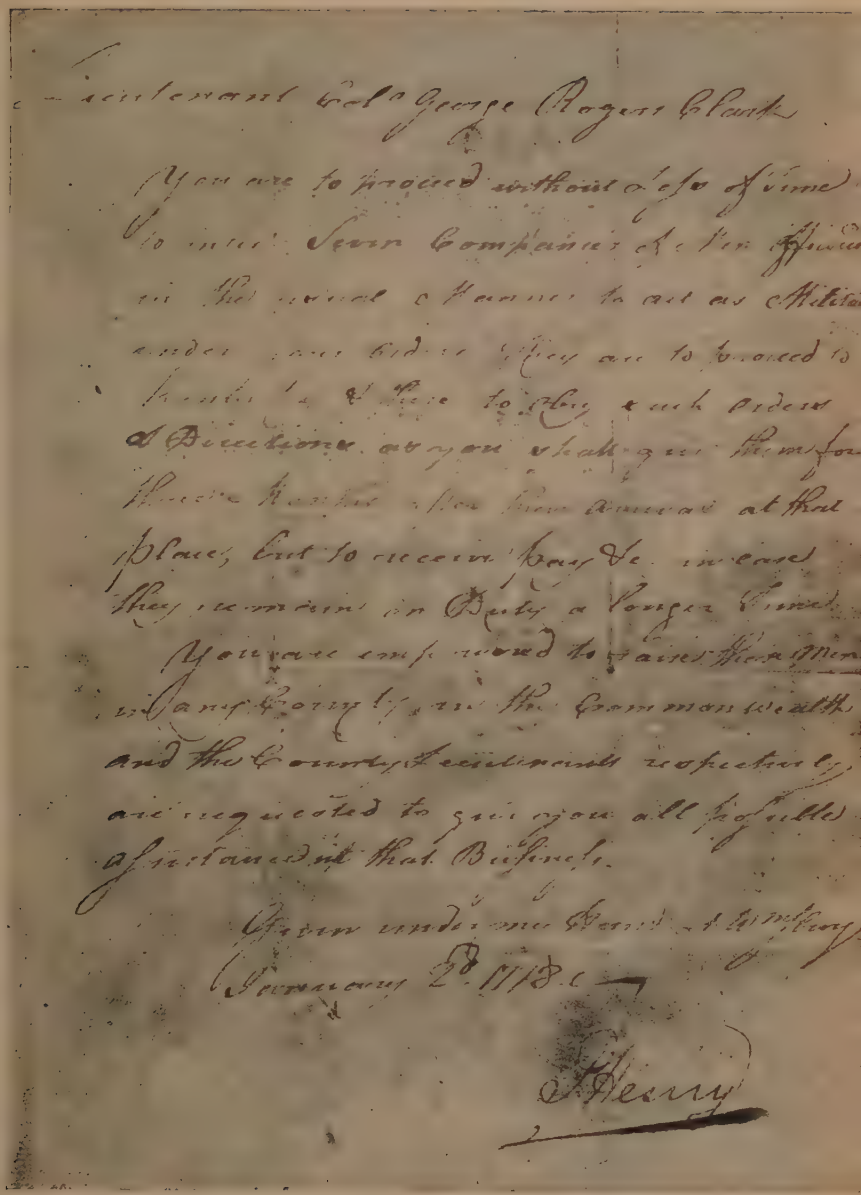

In the Ohio Valley

In 1774, Major Angus MacDonald had built, on the site of Wheeling, Fort Fincastle, so named in honor of the earl of Dunmore, the last royal governor of Virginia, and later rechristened Fort Henry in honor of the first state governor of that commonwealth. Throughout the winter of 1776–77, the Indians prepared for war and before the snow was off the ground their parties crossed the Ohio and fell on the frontiers from the Monongahela to the Kentucky. Many settlers were killed or captured, some of the smaller stockades were taken and destroyed, but an attack upon Fort Henry by two or three hundred Indians and a party of Detroit rangers carrying the British colors was repulsed with loss.

George Rogers Clark

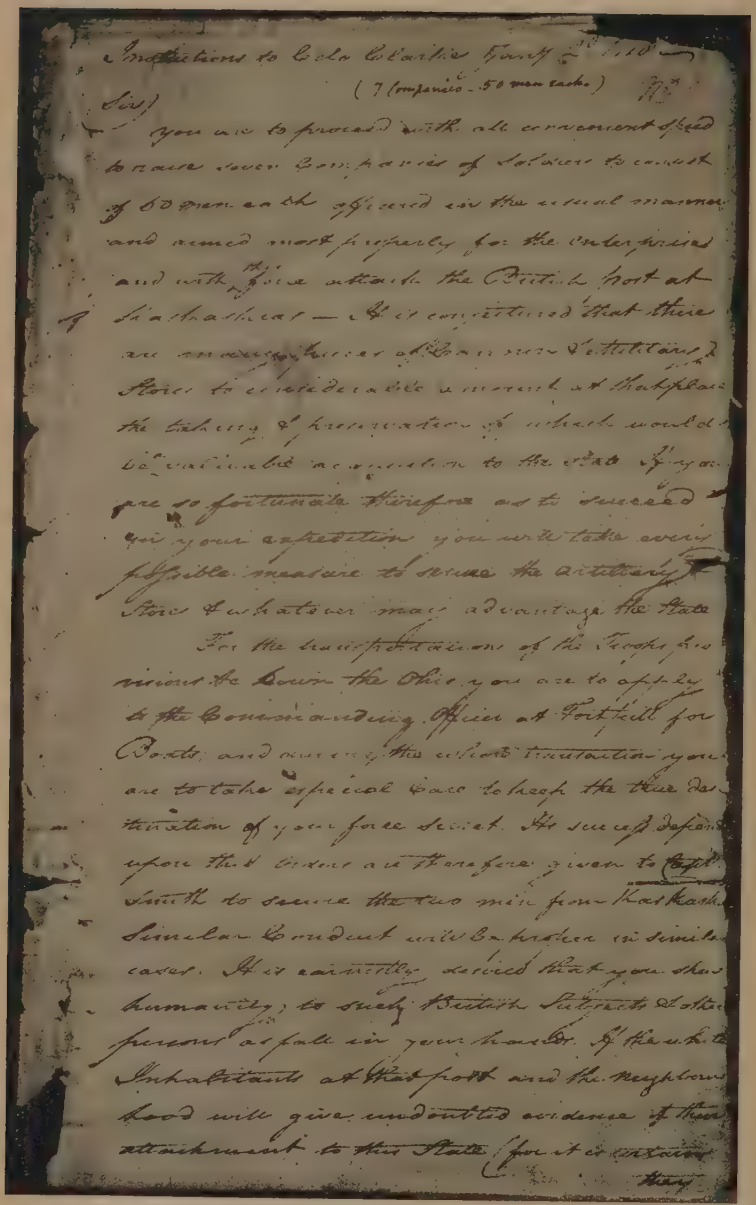

June, 1776

Among those who assisted in defending Harrodsburg that summer was George Rogers Clark, the young Virginian who, as told in the preceding volume, was sent from Kentucky as a delegate to the Virginia convention. At Williamsburg, Clark and his associate found that the legislature had adjourned. They therefore presented the petition of the West Fincastle committee to Governor Henry and his council. Mr. Roosevelt says that the "petition was couched in English that was, at times, a little crooked but the idea at any rate was perfectly straight and could not be misunderstood." With admirable perspicuity, it set forth what the petitioners desired, what they were willing to do, and how "impolitical it

Public Instructions Given to George Rogers Clark by Patrick Henry, January 2, 1778

(From original document in the Library of Wisconsin Historical Society, Madison, Wisconsin)

Instructions to Colo Clarke Given [illegible]

(7 companies - 50 men each.)

Sir)

You are to proceed with all convenient speed to raise seven Companies of Soldiers to consist of 60 men each officered in the usual manner and armed most properly for the enterprise and with them attack the British Post at Kaskaskias. It is conjectured that there are on the Way Hunters and Settlers & Stores to a considerable amount at that place the taking & preservation of which would be of valuable consideration to the state. If you are so fortunate therefore as to succeed in your expedition you will take every possible measure to secure the Artillary Stores & whatever may advantage the State.

For the transportation of the Troops & provisions down the Ohio you are to apply to the Commanding Officer at Fort Pitt for Boats and during the whole transportation you are to take especial Care to preserve the Discipline of your Force exact. It is much depending upon that Order a Warrant is given to Capt. Smith to secure the two mile from Kaskaskias. Similar Conduct will be practised in similar cases. It is earnestly desired that you shew humanity to such British Subjects & other persons as fall in your hands. If the Inhabitants at that post and the Neighbourhood will give undoubted evidence of their attachment to this State (for it is extreme[illegible] would be to suffer such a Respectable Body of Prime Riflemen to remain in a state of neutrality" during the Revolutionary war. The Kentucky delegates secured five hundred pounds of powder for the frontier settlers and the organization of Kentucky as a Virginia county. By no means satisfied with these exploits, Clark resolved to secure Kentucky's safety by conquering the region northwest of the Ohio. In April, 1777, he sent two young hunters to the Illinois country to spy out the land. They brought back a report that Clark deemed favorable and he governed himself accordingly. 1776 1778 June 22

First Page of Private Instructions Given to George Rogers Clark by Patrick Henry, January 2, 1778

(From original document in collection of the Virginia Historical Society, Richmond, Virginia)

Without publishing his plan, Clark laid his project before Governor Patrick Henry and asked for aid. It was important that Clark's real purpose should be kept secret and, although an act was passed by the legislature authorizing "the governor, with the advice of the privy council," to organize an expedition "to march against and attack any of our western enemies," but few knew the real intent of the measure. The council gave its consent, and Henry authorized Clark, as lieutenant-colonel, to raise seven companies of fifty men each, advanced him twelve hundred pounds, probably in the depreciated Virginia currency, gave him an order on the commanding officer at Fort Pitt for ammunition, supplies, and boats, and two sets of instructions, one for himself and the other for the public. Of those who were in the secret, were Thomas Jefferson, George Mason, and George Wythe. With characteristic far-vision, Jefferson wrote that the proposed expedition to the Wabash would, "if successful, have an important bearing ultimately in establishing our western boundary." Thus, Clark, a young man of twenty-six, was about to take into his hands the fate of a region larger and richer in natural resources than any European kingdom except Russia. Lieutenant-colonel Clark January 2, 1778

On the twelfth of May, 1778, the young commander left Red Stone on the Monongahela with a force of about one hundred and fifty men. With him were a number of settlers who were taking advantage of the protection his force afforded to reach Kentucky. The expe- At Louisville dition stopped for stores at Fort Pitt and Fort Henry (Wheeling), whence the flotilla of clumsy flatboats drifted down the Ohio. About the twenty-seventh, they reached the Falls of the Ohio. Here Clark established a post on Corn Island opposite the present Louisville and was joined by a contingent of Kentuckians, including John Bowman and the celebrated Simon Kenton. 1778

MAP OF INDIAN OPERATIONS IN THE WEST

Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, Military Academy, West Point, N. Y., and David Maydole Matteson, A. M., Cambridge, Mass.

At Kaskaskia

On the twenty-fourth of June, the little expedition, consisting of about one hundred and seventy-five men, put out from shore and shot the falls in the midst of an almost total eclipse of the sun. At the mouth of the Tennessee, they were joined by a party of hunters who had come from Kaskaskia and agreed to guide the expedition thither. Landing near the deserted site of Fort Massac, they struck northwestward across the tangled forests and rich prairies of southern Illinois. On the evening of the fourth of July, they reached the Kaskaskia River, three miles from the town. Rocheblave, the commandant, and the inhabitants were totally unaware of their approach and, without any bloodshed, Clark surprised and mastered both town and fort.

Sagacity and Diplomacy

Clark now played his part with consummate skill. He reduced the creoles to a state of terror by ordering them to keep to their houses on pain of death and then disarming them; when a deputation visited him to ask their lives, he explained that, though the Americans came as conquerors, they had no desire to enslave the conquered. If they chose, they might become citizens of the republic and be welcomed to all its privileges. He announced that France was the ally of the United States. When Father Pierre Gibault, the village priest, asked if he might once more perform services in his church, Clark told him that by the laws of the state his religion had as great privileges as any other. From the depths of 1778 despondency the people ascended to the heights of joy. A body of Kaskaskia volunteers accompanied a detachment under Captain Bowman to Cahokia where in like manner the people were won over. About the same time, Father Gibault went to Vincennes and persuaded the people there to take the same oath. Captain Leonard Helm was sent thither to take command of the fort. About the first of August, Father Gibault returned to Kaskaskia. Every British post in the Illinois country had passed without a battle or the loss of a life into the possession of the Americans. The possibility of such an outcome of a month's campaign involves the facts that the royal proclamation of 1763 had left the French residents of that region outside the pale of any civil authority and that even the Quebec act had not relieved them of their subjection to the military administration of a traditionally hated race.

Autograph of the Missionary Pierre Gibault

A Resourceful Commander

As the enlistments of Clark's men expired, it was with great difficulty that he persuaded about a hundred to stay with him eight months longer. He sent the others home and induced many young Frenchmen to enlist. His dealings with the Indians were more difficult. Most of these had been hostile; now they were confused. From far and near they gathered by hundreds at Cahokia to confer with Clark and to decide upon their course. By a pretense of indifference and of power that he did not possess, he led them to sue for peace. He says that he gave them "harsh language to supply the want of men, well knowing that it was a mistaken notion in many that soft speeches was best for Indians."

Hamilton's Counterstroke

When at Detroit, Governor Hamilton heard of the invasion of Illinois and the capture of Vincennes, he at once gathered a force to expel the invaders and, on the seventh of October, left Detroit with about one hundred and seventy-seven white men and sixty Indians. With this force he went down the Detroit River, crossed the western end of Lake Erie, ascended the Maumee, made a nine miles' portage to one of the sources of the Wabash, December 17 and, after great labor and hardship, arrived at Vincennes.

On the way he had been joined by more than two hundred Indians, so that he now had about five hundred men. Captain Helm's scouts had been captured by the British, his French militia promptly deserted, and, being left with only one or two Americans, he was compelled to surrender without resistance. 1778 1779

Clark's Prompt Action

The season was so late that Hamilton went into winter quarters. He had no fear of the Americans for he knew that Clark's army numbered only one hundred and ten. But he did not know the man with whom he had to deal. Having learned from François Vigo, a merchant of Saint Louis, that Hamilton had sent away much of his force and had but eighty men in the garrison, Clark decided to recapture Vincennes. "Our case is desperate," he wrote to Governor Henry, "but, sir, we must either quit the country or attack Mr. Hamilton. . . . Perhaps we may be fortunate." Vigo cashed Clark's drafts on the Virginia agent at New Orleans and Clark sent "The Willing," an extemporized gunboat, down the Mississippi and up the Ohio and the Wabash. On the fifth of February, after the troops had been blessed by Father Gibault, the young lieutenant-colonel marched out of Kaskaskia with a force of about one hundred and seventy men, some of whom were French creoles. It was the beginning of an expedition that was one of the most daring in conception and one of the most brilliant in execution recorded in American history; in perils and hardships it ranks with Arnold's winter march to Quebec—and it was crowned with success.

January 29, 1779

Out of Egypt

The route before him, about one hundred and seventy miles in length, lay in a region that was so low that during the wet season a large part of it was overflowed. After a week's march, Clark's army came to one of the two branches of the Little Wabash. The flood was so great that "although a league asunder, they now made but one." Some time was spent in building a pirogue. "The fifteenth," says Clark, "happened to be a warm moist day for the season, and the channel of the river where we lay about thirty yards wide. A scaffold was

February 13

1779 built on the opposite shore that was about three feet under water; our baggage [was] ferried across, and put on it. Our horses swam across and received their loads at the scaffold, by which time the troops were brought across and we began our march. Our vessel was loaded with those who were sickly, and we moved on cheerfully." The second branch, being smaller, was crossed more easily. On the seventeenth, they reached the Embarras River and spent the night on a muddy, almost submerged hillock. Unable to cross the river, they followed it down to the Wabash. Major Bowman's journal says that, on the eighteenth, they "came in sight of the swollen banks of the Wabash; made rafts for four men to cross and go up to the town and steal boats; but they spend day and night in the water to no purpose, for there was not one foot of dry land to be found." On the nineteenth, Clark sent two men down the river with orders for the gunboat "to come on day and night, that being our last hope and we starving; no provisions of any sort now two days." On the twentieth, they killed a deer, found some canoes, and captured a small boat containing five Vincennes Frenchmen; the prisoners gave the welcome information that Hamilton was unaware of the American approach. On the twenty-first, the little army crossed the Wabash, but found the whole country, save a few hillocks, under water. The men waded more than a league in water "breast high" and "sometimes to the neck," the boats picking up those who were in danger of drowning. Following the cheerless day, they spent a comfortless, hungry night on a semi-submerged hillock. 1779

Map of George Rogers Clark's Expedition

Wet and Hungry

The next day, after wading for some distance, they came to a wide valley in which the water was so deep that crossing seemed impossible. Clark made soundings from a canoe and found it "as deep as my neck." On his return to his army, the commander marched into the water and the men "fell in, one after another, without saying a word, like a flock of sheep." Presently one of the men found a path beneath his feet and, following it, "we came one league farther to some sugar camps, where we staid all night. Heard the evening and morning guns from the fort. No provisions yet. Lord help us!"

February 22

Likewise Cold

That night was freezing cold. "The morning," says Clark, "was the finest we had had on our march. A little after sunrise I lectured the whole." Before them lay a shallow lake four miles across, but the half-starved heroes still followed their leader. When some of the weaker began to fail, the canoes took them aboard, and finally the whole force reached dry land. Fires were built, but some of the men were so chilled that the warmth did not revive them and they had to be walked up and down by the stronger. They had been in water most of the time and almost without food for six days. Fortunately, they captured an "Indian canoe, on board of which was near half a quarter of buffalo, some corn, tallow, kettles, etc. This was a grand prize, and was 1779 invaluable. Broth was immediately made out and served out to the most weakly with care; most of the whole got a little, but a great many gave their part to the weakly, jocosely saying something cheering to their comrades. This little refreshment, and fine weather, by the afternoon, gave new life to the whole. Crossing a narrow deep lake, in the canoes, and marching some distance, we came to a copse of timber called the Warrior's island," two miles from Vincennes.

February 23

Clark at Vincennes

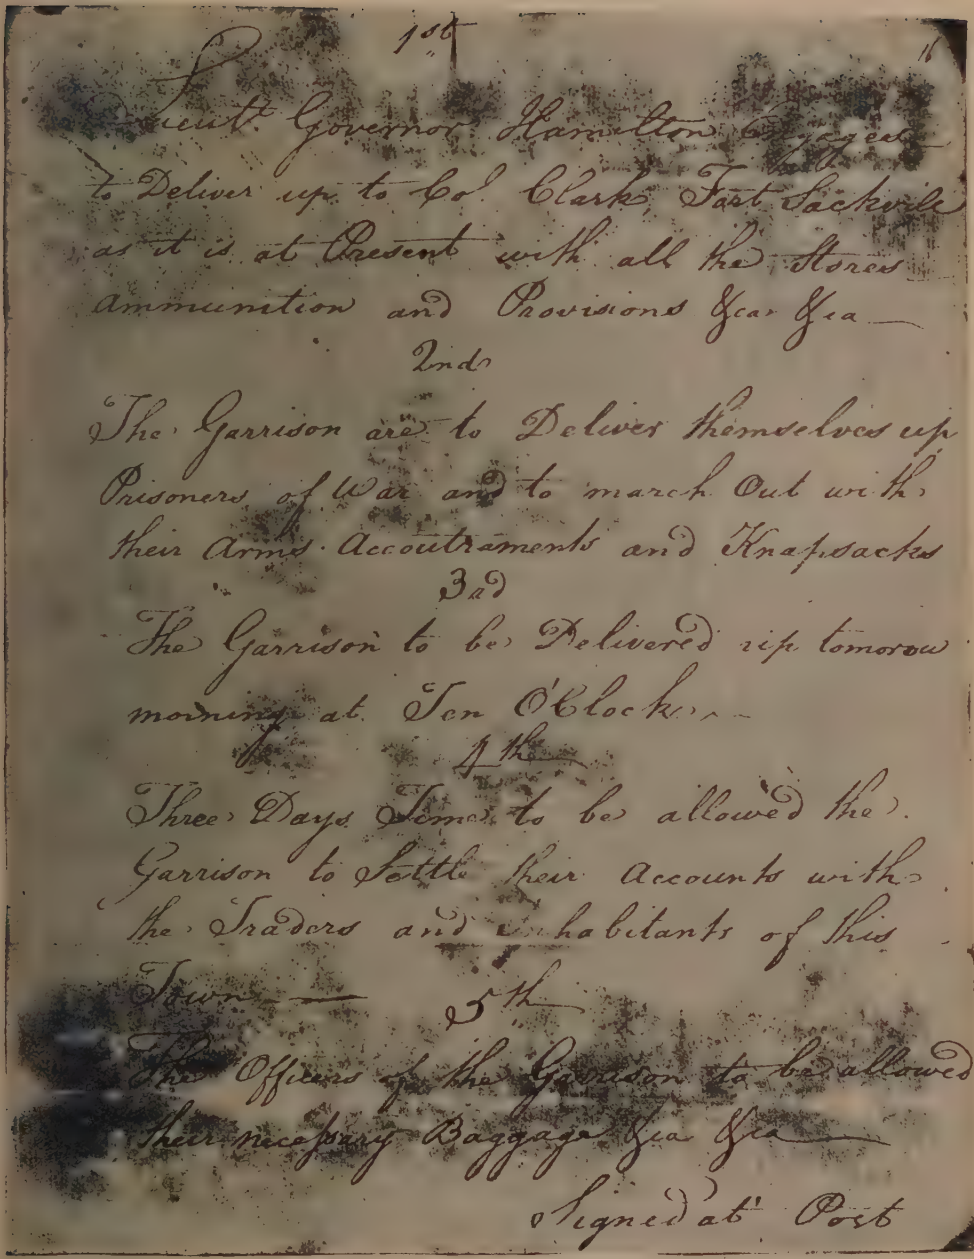

Nothing had yet been heard of "The Willing" which had been unexpectedly delayed by the flood-tide of the Ohio and the Wabash. But Clark knew the danger of delay. Hamilton had not dreamed of an attack at such a time and no one in Vincennes knew of the American approach. The first information came in a letter from Clark announcing that he was about to attack the town and ordering those who were his friends to remain quietly in their houses, while "those, if any there be, that are friends to the king, will instantly repair to the fort, and join the hair-buyer general, and fight like men." None of the inhabitants dared to carry the news to the fort and Hamilton was ignorant of his danger until the fort was actually attacked.

Clark Takes Vincennes

Throughout the night, the Americans kept up a hot fusillade, and rifle-pits were dug so close to the walls that the guns could not be depressed enough to fire upon the assailants. When the artillerymen attempted to serve the guns, they were shot down and every loophole was made a mark for Clark's skilled riflemen. Early in the forenoon, Clark demanded a surrender. While negotiations were going on, a party of Indians and white men returned from a foray and unsuspectingly entered the town; about nine of them were killed or captured; four were tomahawked and thrown into the river within sight of the garrison. In the afternoon, Hamilton asked for further negotiations and finally surrendered. The Americans followed up their success by capturing on the Wabash a convoy coming from Detroit to Vincennes with ammunition, provisions, and clothing worth about ten thousand pounds. Some of the prisoners were 1st

February 25

Lieut. Governor Hamilton agrees to Deliver up to Col. Clark Fort Sackville as it is at Present with all the Stores ammunition and Provisions &c &c &c

2nd

The Garrison are to Deliver themselves up Prisoners of War and to march Out with their Arms Accoutraments and Knapsacks

3d

The Garrison to be Delivered up tomorow morning at Ten O'Clock

4th

Three Days Time to be allowed the Garrison to Settle their Accounts with the Traders and Inhabitants of this Town

5th

The Officers of the Garrison to be allowed their necessary Baggage &c &c &c

Signed at Post

ARTICLES OF CAPITULATION OF FOR

(From facsimile in possession of Colonel Cla

Post Vincents the 24th Day of Febry 1779.

G. Clarke

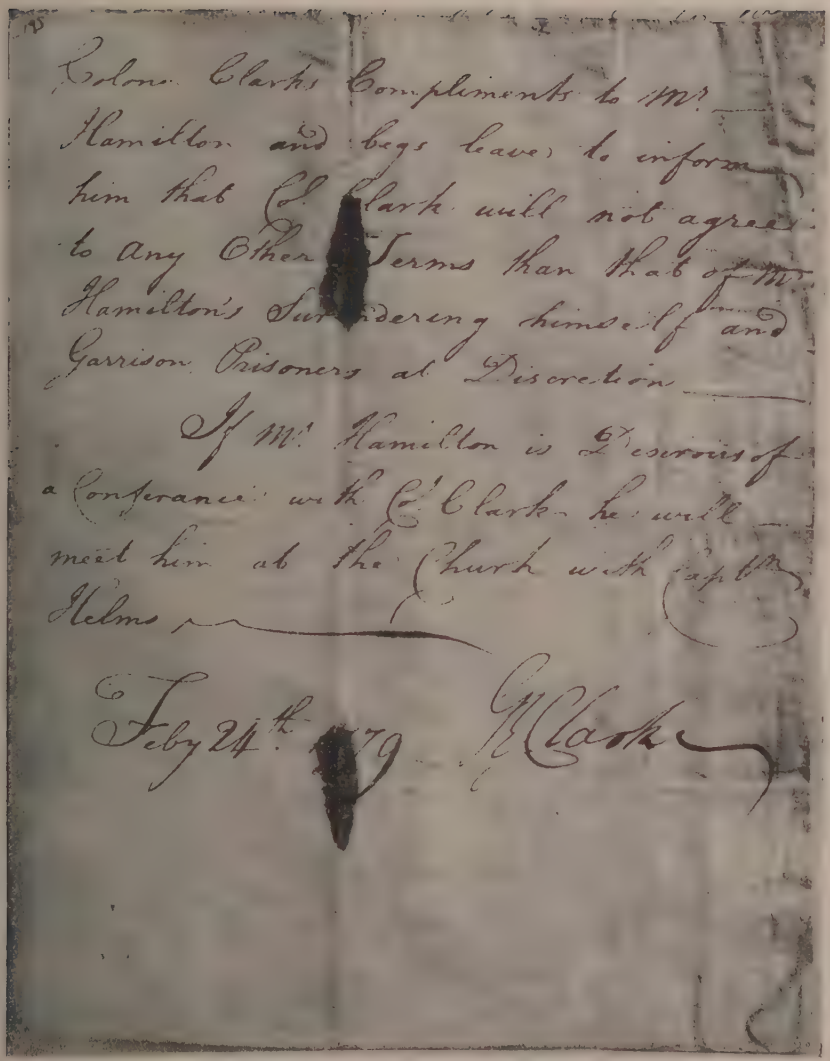

Agreed to, for the following reasons —

The remoteness from Succour —
The State and Quantity of Provisions &c.
The unanimity of Officers and Men on the Expediency —
The honorable Terms allowed — and Lastly, the Confidence in a generous Enemy —

Henry Hamilton
Lieut. Gov.r and Superintd.t

Post Vincennes
Feb.y 24th 1779 —

VINCENNES, FEBRUARY 24, 1779 nce Monroe Burton, of Detroit, Mich.)

Colonel Clark's Compliments to Mr. Hamilton and begs leave to inform him that Col. Clark will not agree to any Other Terms than that of Mr. Hamilton's Surrendering himself and Garrison Prisoners at Discretion.

If Mr. Hamilton is Desirous of a Conferance with Col. Clark he will meet him at the Church with Capt. Helms.

Feby 24th. 1779 G. Clark

LETTER BY GEORGE ROGERS CLARK TO LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR HENRY HAMILTON, DEMANDING UNCONDITIONAL SURRENDER OF VINCENNES

From original in the Draper MS. collection, State Historical Society of Wisconsin, Madison, Wisconsin

1779 1780 paroled; Hamilton and twenty-five others were sent to Virginia where, by order of the executive council, they were ironed and kept in close confinement. Hamilton was paroled in October, 1780. In that month, the country northwest of the Ohio was organized as Illinois County — a part of Virginia.

For the Capture of Detroit

From the goods captured with the convoy, clothing was reserved for the troops that Clark expected soon to lead against Detroit, an expedition that he had been planning ever since his entry into the Illinois country. Leaving Captain Helm in charge at Vincennes with a garrison of forty men for the fort, Clark returned by river to Kaskaskia where he was received by Captain Robert George who with forty men had come up the Mississippi from New Orleans. In July, 1779, Clark was again at Vincennes expecting Virginia and Kentucky troops for the projected expedition. Of the three hundred promised from Kentucky, only thirty came. The expedition was not organized and Clark's spirit chafed under the disappointment.

The Saving of Kentucky

While Clark was winning the Old Northwest, there was trouble south of the Ohio with an almost even chance that the settlers would be driven from the "dark and bloody ground." In 1778, Daniel Boone had been captured and adopted by the Indians. He escaped and gave timely warning of a projected expedition. Early in September, the enemy, numbering about four hundred Indians and about forty French Canadians, were driven off with heavy loss — the last siege of Boonesboro. Clark's successes overawed the Indians, there was a great and immediate increase of immigration, and Kentucky was never again in real danger of annihilation, but there were raids and counter-raids for years thereafter.

Byrd's Expedition

By May, 1780, Colonel Arent Schuyler de Peyster, a New York Tory of old Knickerbocker stock who had been made the British commandant at Detroit, had fitted out two thousand warriors, hoping to retake Vincennes and to wipe out the clustered wooden forts south of the Ohio. In the latter part of the month, he sent out Captain Henry Byrd with about six hundred Indians, a few Canadians, and two small pieces of artillery. Moving southward by way of the Miami River, Byrd surprised and captured Ruddle's and Martin's stations in Kentucky and then rapidly retreated to Detroit. 1780 June 22

Clark again in Active Service

Meantime, George Rogers Clark was gathering a force at the mouth of the Licking. Among them were such famous fighters as Kenton, Harrod, and Floyd; the second in command was Benjamin Logan. With nearly a thousand men, Clark hastened into the Indian country, burned the town of Old Chillicothe, and pushed on to Piqua where there was a running fight followed by a stubborn contest. After destroying the Indian houses and a large quantity of corn, Clark's army marched back to the mouth of the Licking and was disbanded. For the rest of the year, the settlements south of the Ohio were not much molested. In November, the Virginia legislature divided Kentucky into three counties, Jefferson, Lincoln, and Fayette. Each county had its colonel, and Clark was stationed at the Falls of the Ohio as brigadier-general in command over all. August 8

Clark's Pet Project

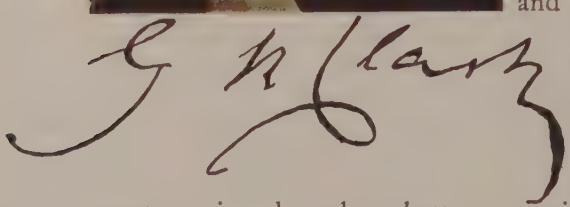

During all these months, Clark had been anxious for an opportunity to take Detroit. In September, 1780, Jefferson wrote to Washington urging him to furnish the necessary means and, late in December, Washington gave Clark an order on the commandant at Fort Pitt for artillery and stores and such troops as could be spared. Then came Benedict Arnold's invasion of Virginia, as will be explained in the next chapter. Clark tendered his services to Steuben and, "with a small body of militia, received the enemy in Indian and western fashion." In May, 1781, Clark wrote to Washington saying: "I have not yet lost sight of Detroit." In December, 1781, it was reported that the expedition was a failure, and "the buffalo meat all rotten." The opportunity for taking Detroit had passed.

Tardy Appreciation

The little handful of men who had won an empire for the young republic deserved a rich reward, but the emoluments that they actually received were meager. As just explained, Clark was made a brigadier-general 1780–1783 and, for some years, performed good service against the Indians. In 1781, Virginia granted to him, his officers, and men a hundred and fifty thousand acres of land that was later located in what are now Clark, Floyd, and Scott counties in southern Indiana; but a principality in Utopia may be worth less than an acre in Middlesex. In 1783, Clark was relieved of his command and left nearly penniless. Feeling that he had been badly used, he spent the last years of his life in solitude and poverty; in 1818, he died a paralyzed and helpless cripple; the careful searcher may find his grave in Cave Hill cemetery at Louisville. In recent years, his great services have been better appreciated and History now holds him up as one of the great figures of the American revolution.

François Vigo

Among those who deserved better of the United States than was accorded to them were two financiers of Clark's great campaign, François Vigo and Oliver Pollock. Vigo, a Sardinian by birth, had accompanied a Spanish regiment to New Orleans, left the army, and engaged in the Indian trade. His business prospered and, in 1778, he had an establishment at Saint Louis. It was he who first made known to Clark Hamilton's capture of Vincennes. The French of the Illinois country had no liking for the continental currency and Clark would 1780 probably have been helpless had not Vigo cashed his 1784 drafts on the Virginia agent at New Orleans, advancing

Relics of George Rogers Clark — Rifle, Tomahawk, Watch, Pocket Compass, Knife, Powder-horn, Pistol, and Sword
(In possession of Col. R. T. Durrett, Louisville, Ky.)

thus about twelve thousand dollars, a large sum for those days. But Virginia was hard pressed for money and payment was not possible. When, in 1783–84, Virginia conveyed her western territory to the United States, it was stipulated that expenses incurred by the state, "in acquiring any part of the territory so ceded or relinquished, shall be fully reimbursed by the United States." Vigo later settled at Vincennes, lived in comparative poverty, and died at Terre Haute in 1836. From time to time, his claim was presented to congress. Its general justice was not disputed; seven times did committees of the house of representatives report in its favor; twice did the house pass bills for its payment; and, in the senate, bills providing for payment were reported. In 1872, both houses passed a bill referring it to the court of claims which, in 1873, found in favor of the heirs of François Vigo. The national government took the case to the supreme court 1777 which, in 1876, allowed the claim with interest and gave 1784 a judgment for more than fifty thousand dollars.

Oliver Pollock

The Virginia agent at New Orleans at the time of Clark's conquest was Oliver Pollock, a native of Ireland. About 1760, Pollock came to Pennsylvania whence, a few years later, he removed to Havana and there engaged in mercantile pursuits. In 1767, he took up his residence at New Orleans where he accumulated a large fortune. In 1777, the secret committee of the continental congress made him the commercial agent of the United States at New Orleans, a position that he held until 1783, freely using his own credit in aid of the colonies. From March, 1778, to November, 1779, Clark drew from Pollock more than fifty thousand dollars in specie; from September, 1776, to August, 1781, Pollock advanced, on the Virginia account and mainly for Clark's expedition, more than ninety-one thousand dollars in specie. But the continental credit was so poor and Virginia's inability to pay was so complete that Pollock's appeals for remittances brought no substantial response. In 1783, Pollock was made United States agent at Havana and left New Orleans largely indebted to the royal treasury for moneys advanced and for which the committee of congress had not been able to make reimbursement. In 1784, the Virginia bills on France were sent to Havana for collection and Pollock, not being able to pay them, was arrested for the debt and kept in close custody for eighteen months. In December, 1785, congress voted Pollock ninety thousand dollars, but the treasury was empty and the money was not paid until 1791. In 1792, he returned to Pennsylvania and, in 1823, he died in Mississippi. 1781 1782

François Vigo

The Murder of the Christian Indians

In 1772, some persecuted Moravian missionaries and Indian converts moved from Pennsylvania to the valley of the Muskingum in Ohio. Before the war with England came, these "Christian Indians" had adopted the better habits of civilized life, and the missionaries believed that the whole Delaware tribe would soon come under their influence. But the British thought that the non-resistant Moravians were in alliance with the Americans, and the frontier settlers hated the dusky converts because they were Indians. In 1781, the governor at Detroit sent a party to urge the missionaries and their converts to accept the protection of the British at Upper Sandusky. The British party arrived at Gnadenhutten on the tenth of August. When their invitation was declined, houses were destroyed and cattle shot until the gentle missionaries were worn out. In September, they accompanied "their uninvited escorts" to the country of the Wyandots. The winter was one of hunger and, in the spring, about a hundred of the exiles returned to the deserted homes to gather of the corn that had been left standing in the fields in September. Then Colonel David Williamson hastily collected a band of borderers and hastened to the valley of the Muskingum where they found the Indians harvesting their corn. The white men shut the red men in a building and took a vote as to whether the captives should be carried to Fort Pitt or murdered where they were. Only eighteen votes were cast on the side of mercy. The prisoners were then told that "inasmuch as they were Christians, they would be given one night to prepare for death in a Christian manner;" in the morning, "ninety-six persons magnified the name of the Lord by patiently meeting a cruel death." The centennial of the massacre was celebrated at Gnadenhutten by the erection of a monument to the victims.

March, 1782

1782 The Crawford Expedition

On the twenty-fifth of May, a party of more than four hundred mounted backwoodsmen, including most of those who a few weeks before had shown their prowess in the murder of the inoffensive hundred, set out from Mingo Bottom (Steubenville) on the Ohio to punish the hostile Indians and to "put a stop if possible to the scalping, murdering and plundering which was continually committed on the defenceless settlers." The command had been given by vote to Colonel William Crawford, a brave officer of experience. But their plans were made known to the Indians, other tribes went to the aid of the Wyandots and Delawares, and artillery and British soldiers were sent from Detroit.

Autograph of William Crawford

June 5, 6

There were two battles in which the Americans were outnumbered and defeated. Before the middle of the month, the remnant of the expedition was again at Mingo Bottom, a defeated and demoralized rabble. Colonel Crawford had been captured and none of the stragglers could tell anything of his fate. He was burned at the stake; "the barbarity of the Indian mind exhausted itself in the ingenuity of the tortures with which he was put to death."

June 11

Elizabeth Zane

In September, 1782, Fort Henry (Wheeling) was a second time attacked. The desperate battle that ensued is now chiefly remembered because of the hazardous and successful expedition of Elizabeth Zane. When the ammunition of the garrison was exhausted, she ran from the fort to her brother's house, sixty yards distant. Taking from a table its stout homespun cloth, she knotted it about her waist and poured in the precious grains. On her return, the Indians recognized the meaning of her mission, but the faster the bullets flew the faster she fled; with her load, she reached the fort in safety. The powder was used wisely and, on the fourteenth, the enemy withdrew.

A Year of Blood

This was "Kentucky's year of blood." In August, a large force of Indians and Detroit rangers under Caldwell,

SIEGE OF FORT HENRY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1782, THE LAST BATTLE OF THE REVOLUTION

From historical painting by J. A. Faris of Wheeling, West Virginia. While imaginative, it is a careful study of the conditions attending the incidents, and is of interest and value on that account 1782 McKee, and Girty "the renegade," attacked Bryan's Station. They were driven off, but drew a party of August 19 pursuers into an ambuscade at the Blue Licks, killed seventy, captured seven, and wounded many more. In revenge, Clark led an expedition that destroyed the Indian towns on the Little Miami. This was the last important expedition before peace was declared, but Detroit remained in British possession and war still smoldered on the border.

CHAPTER IX

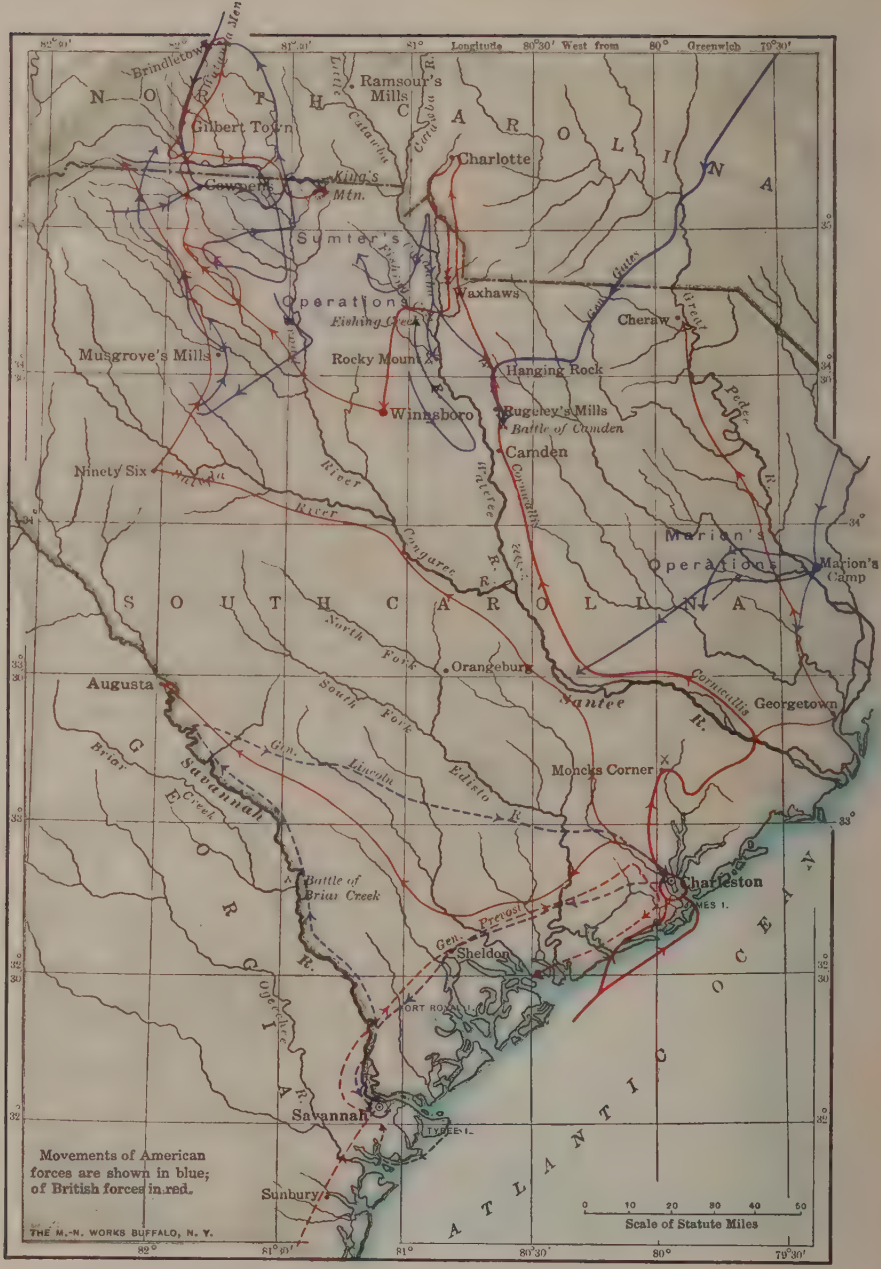

THE SECOND ATTEMPT UPON THE SOUTH

The British take Savannah

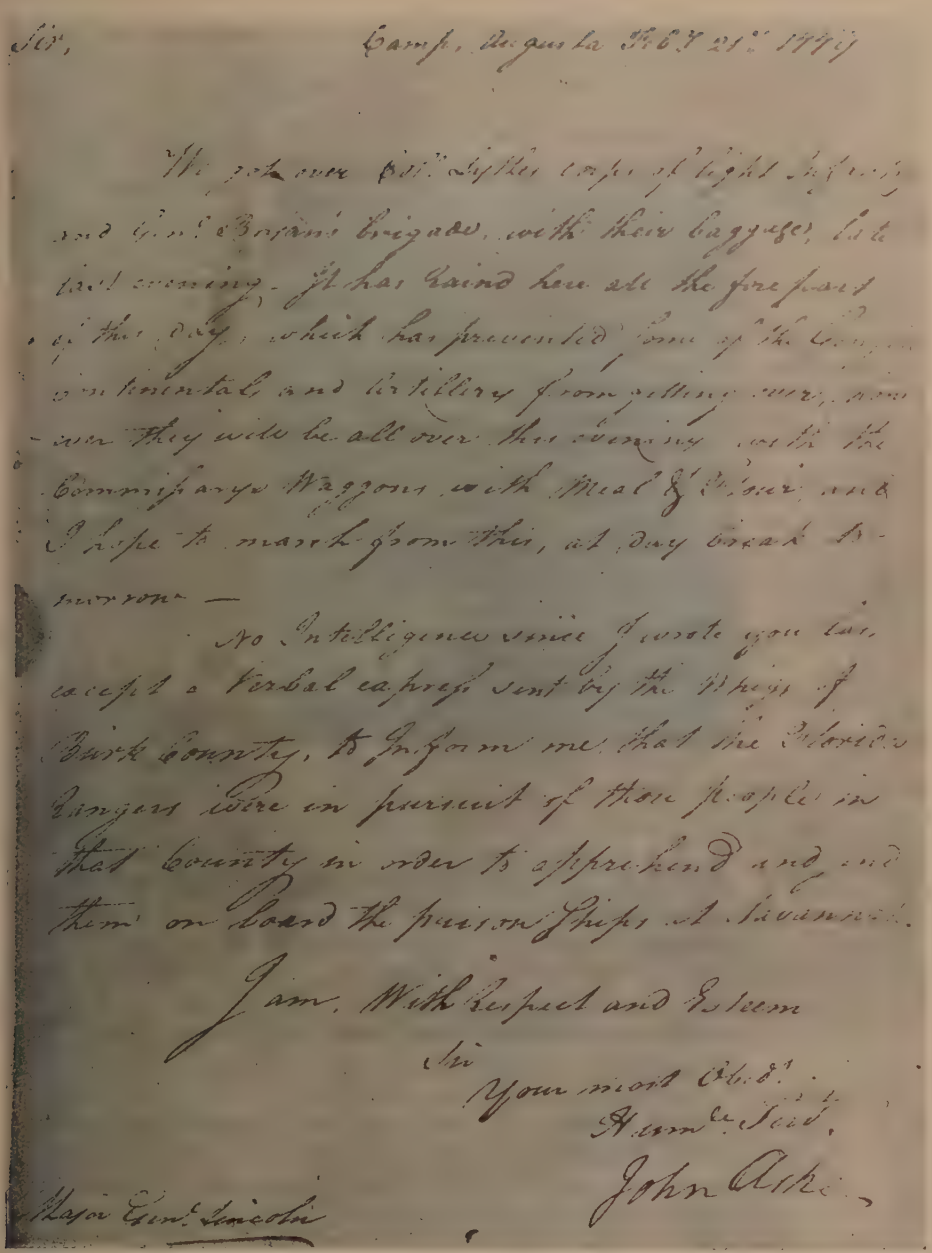

SINCE the failure of the attempt upon Charleston in 1776, the southern states had been free from serious attack. As the net result of several years of fighting, the British forces now held Newport and New York while the Americans held the rest of the country. The British ministry resolved to seek another field and to force the people of the sparsely settled southern states back to their allegiance to the king. In November, 1778, Sir Henry Clinton sent Lieutenant-colonel Archibald Campbell from New York with about thirty-five hundred men. On the twenty-third of December, the fleet was off Tybee. Without waiting for Brigadier-general Augustine Prevost and the reinforcements that he was leading from Saint Augustine, the fleet entered the river and, on the afternoon of the twenty-eighth was off Brewton Hill, about three miles below Savannah. Between the hill and the city were a morass and General Robert Howe of North Carolina with about a thousand men. On the twenty-ninth, Campbell advanced to the attack; the American line was broken and, in panic and confusion and with great loss, Howe's men were driven into South Carolina. With a loss of only twenty-four, the British took Savannah and more than four hundred prisoners. It was the beginning of a definite attempt to roll up the American line from the southward. From Florida, Prevost

Autograph of Augustine Prevost

General Map of the Southern Campaign of 1780

Sir, Camp, Augusta Feb.y 21st 1779

We got over Col.o Leslie's corps of light Infantry and Gen.l Bryan's Brigade, with their Baggage, late last evening. It has rained here all the forepart of this day, which has prevented some of the Continental and Artillery from getting over, and even they will be all over this evening, with the Commissarys Waggons with Meal & Flour, and I hope to march from this, at day break to-morrow —

No Intelligence since I wrote you last, except a Verbal express sent by the Magis.s of Burk County, to Inform me that the Florida Rangers were in pursuit of those People in that County in order to apprehend and send them on board the prison Ships at Savannah.

I am, With Respect and Esteem

Sir

Your most Obed.t

Humble Serv.t

John Ashe

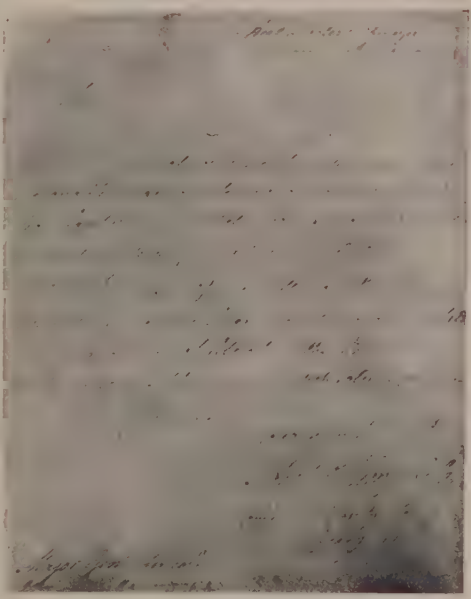

Major Gen.l Lincoln

LETTER TO MAJOR-GENERAL BENJAMIN LINCOLN FROM GENERAL JOHN ASHE, REGARDING MOVEMENTS OF THE TROOPS IN GEORGIA, DATED FEBRUARY 21, 1779

(From original in the New York Public Library, Emmet Collection)

invaded Georgia, took Sunbury, and assumed the command at Savannah, while Campbell captured Augusta. 1779

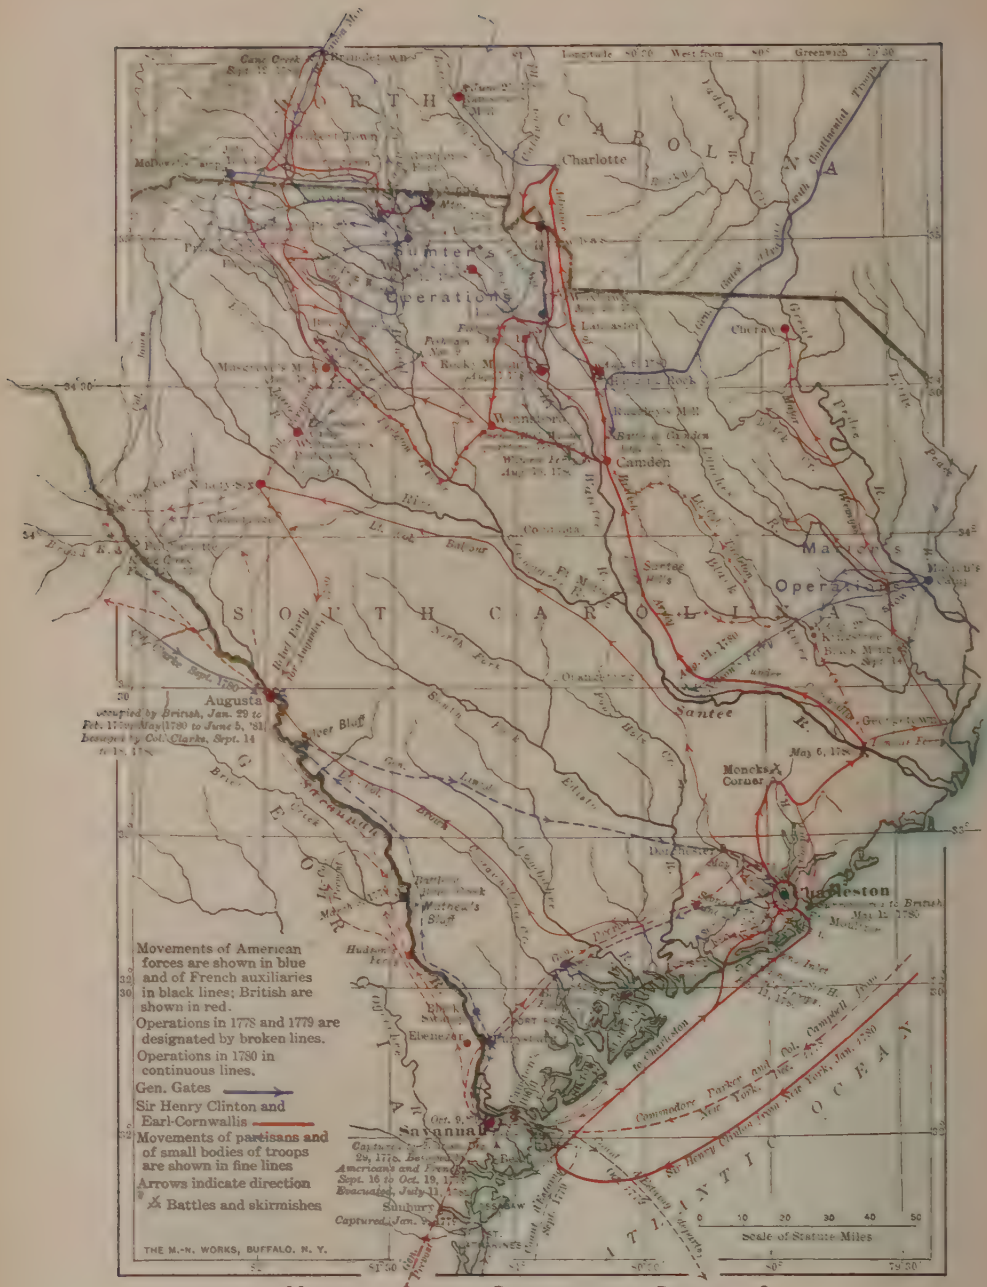

General Lincoln and his Militia

Campbell's Letter to Lincoln relative to Exchange of Prisoners, dated January 9, 1779

At the request of southern delegates, congress had appointed General Lincoln to the southern command. He arrived at Charleston on the sixth of December. Gathering a force of about thirty-six hundred ill-disciplined men with troublesome notions of personal independence, Lincoln advanced to the Savannah River. Most of these men were militia who, when militia operations went awry, fled to the swamps and woods and carried on a murderous and predatory warfare against neighbors who were on the other side, a partisan conflict that had no equal in any other part of the country. In February, the British attempted to effect a lodgment on Port Royal Island but were driven off by Colonel Moultrie, and a body of about eight hundred loyalist banditti under Colonel Boyd were scattered by a force gathered by Colonel Andrew Pickens. Seventy of Boyd's Tories were captured and five of them were hung for treason against the state of South Carolina. Early in March, Lincoln began a movement upon Augusta, but the enemy fell upon a detachment of about fifteen hundred under General Ashe at Briar Creek and routed it so completely that only about four

February 2

MAP OF THE SOUTHERN CAMPAIGN TO THE CLOSE OF 1780, INVASION OF THE CAROLINAS

Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, Military Academy, West Point, N. Y., and David Maydole Matteson, A. M., Cambridge, Mass.

By AUGUSTIN PREVOST Esq; Brigadier-General, and Commander in Chief of His MAJESTY'S Troops in the Southern Diſtrict, HYDE PARKER, Jun. Esq; commanding His Majeſty's Ships in the River Savannah, and ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, Esq; commanding the Northern Detachment.

A PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS the King, in Parliament, being deſirous to reſtore the Bleſſings of Reconciliation and peace to Great-Britain and the Colonies, did, in the courſe of the laſt year, repeal certain acts, which were found to have excited jealouſies, and to have given apprehenſions of danger to liberty in the ſaid colonies: And whereas the inhabitants of Georgia have acknowledged, that the benevolent overtures of Great-Britain in that reſpect, are ſuch as come up to every wiſh, that they in the hour of temperate deliberation, or the utmoſt apprehenſions of danger to liberty had ever expreſſed, and have ſealed that acknowledgement by the ſacred teſtimony of their juſt allegiance to the crown.

WE, the commanding Officers of His Majeſty's fleet and army, from a juſt regard to the welfare of Georgia, and for the preſervation of peace and good order among its inhabitants, DO HEREBY DECLARE, that all the laws of the province of Georgia, which were in force at the end of the year 1775. ARE, and ſhall continue in full force, until ſuch time as a period of leiſs diſquiet, ſhall enable a future General Aſſembly, to alter or amend them. And for the more immediate and effectual execution of juſtice, without which the property of individuals cannot be ſafe, public confidence reſtored, nor domeſtick tranquility confirmed; WE, hereby nominate and appoint the following gentlemen, to the ſeveral departments of the civil government in Georgia, 'till His Majeſty's pleaſure is known, namely,

His Honour Lieut. Col. JAMES MARK PREVOST, Eſq; Lieutenant Governor.

MEMBERS of COUNCIL.

The Honourable Lewis Johnſton, Eſq;
John Hume, Eſq;
James Penman, Eſq;
Martin Jollie, Eſq;
James Robertſon, Eſq;
William Telfair, Eſq;
James Moſeman, Eſq;
Roger Kelſall, Eſq;

COMMISSIONERS of CLAIMS.

James Penman, Eſq;
Martin Jollie, Eſq;
James Robertſon, Eſq;
William Telfair, Eſq;
Roger Kelſall, Eſq;

Lewis Johnſton, Eſq; Chief Juſtice,
Martin Jollie, } Aſſiſtant Judges.
John Mullryne, }
James Robertſon, Eſq; Attorney General,
John Hume, Eſq; Secretary of the Province,
Angus Campbell, Eſq; Prothonotary,
Joſeph Farley, Eſq; Provoſt Marſhall,
Lewis Johnſton, Eſq; Treaſurer,
Robert M'Culloh, Eſq; Collector of the Cuſtoms, William Brown, Eſq; Comptroller,
Steven Haven, Eſq; Naval Officer,
Martin Jollie, Eſq; Judge of the Admiralty,
Rigdon Brice, Eſq; Marſhal of the Court of Admiralty, William Stewart, Eſq; Notary Public,
Alexander Wylly, Eſq; Clerk of the Court,
David Montaigut, Eſq; Clerk of the Council,
Philip Yonge, Eſq; Surveyor General,
The Rev. Mr. Edward Jenkins, Rector of the Pariſh of Chriſt Church.

Given at Savannah, the fourth Day of March, 1779.

AUG. PREVOST,
HYDE PARKER,
ARCH. CAMPBELL.

PROCLAMATION BY PREVOST, PARKER, AND CAMPBELL TO THE PEOPLE OF GEORGIA, DATED MARCH 4, 1779

(From copy in Library of Congress)

hundred and fifty men rejoined the main army. Thus Lincoln lost a third of his army and Prevost regained the upper hand. 1779

South Carolina ordered a regiment of light dragoons and Governor Rutledge gathered the South Carolina militia. On the twentieth of April, Lincoln again moved against Augusta, leaving Moultrie with about a thousand men to defend the line of the lower Savannah. Prevost at once crossed the Savannah, drove the Americans under Moultrie before him, and appeared before Charleston. Defenses were thrown up and, when Prevost crossed the Ashley, Pulaski and his famous legion crossed the Cooper. The state council proposed that South Carolina should become neutral "and the question whether the State shall belong to Great Britain or remain one of the United States, be determined by the treaty of peace between those two powers." Evidently, Rutledge and others dreaded the destruction of their city and the pillage of their state, and they probably were angered by the advice of congress that three thousand of their negroes should be armed. But the younger Laurens would have nothing to do with neutrality; Gadsden and Ferguson voted against the proposal; Edwards, another member of the council, wept at the thought; and Moultrie made no

A Proposed Neutrality

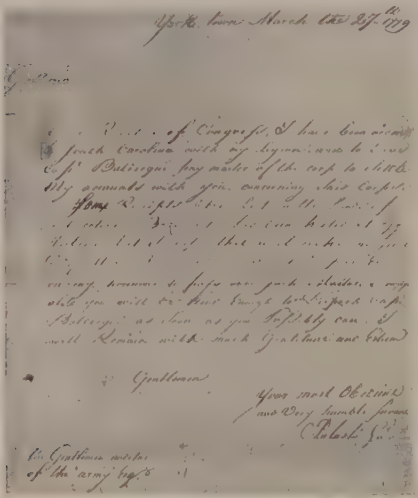

April 28

May 8

1779 effort to conceal his disgust. Prevost demanded a surrender of the garrison and Moultrie exclaimed: "We will fight it out!" The approach of Lincoln temporarily saved the city and the British retreated into Georgia leaving a garrison at Beaufort and carrying off much valuable plunder. The heat became intense, much of the American army melted away, and Lincoln with about eight hundred infusibles retired to Sheldon for summer quarters.

The Siege of Savannah

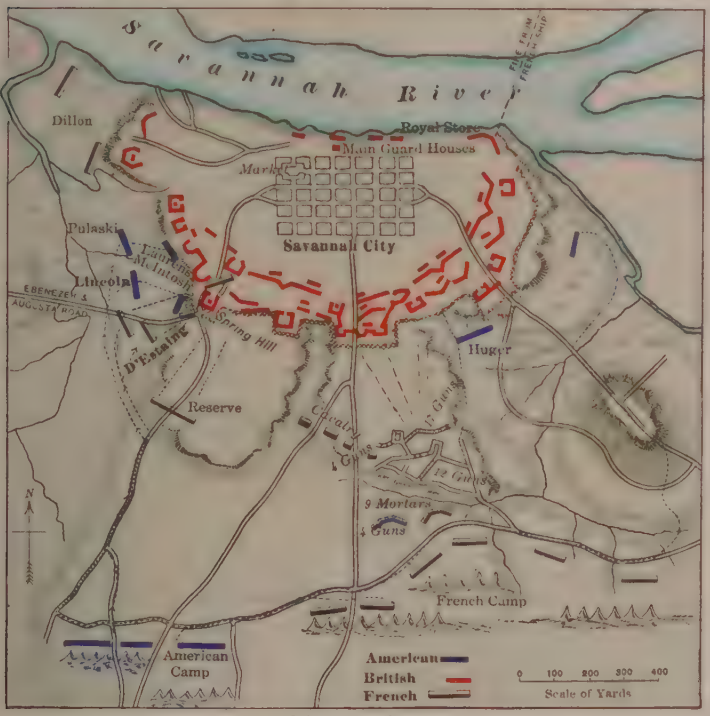

Pulaski's Letter to the Auditor of the Army, March 27, 1779

July 4

After being shut up at Port Royal for several months by a superior British fleet that was called off at the end of June, 1779, Admiral d'Estaing had captured Grenada and then spent some time cruising in the West Indies. On the first of September, he appeared off the Georgia coast so suddenly that he took four British warships by surprise. On the third, he anchored off the mouth of the Savannah River with thirty-five ships and several thousand troops. Arrangements were quickly made for a combined attack upon Savannah. On the evening of the sixteenth, d'Estaing, in the name of the king of France, summoned Prevost to surrender. Lincoln and his troops arrived on the twenty-third and siege operations were begun. In the meantime, the British had been working night and day with relays of negroes strengthening their defenses. "Great God!" exclaimed Marion, "who ever heard anything like this before? First allow your enemy to intrench and then fight him!" The allied army, about seven thousand men, besieged the town for two weeks or more without making much impression. Then, fearing the autumnal storms and the arrival of a British fleet, d'Estaing demanded that the siege be raised or an assault made. On the eighth of October, it was determined to make an assault that night, but a deserter gave the enemy full information of the intended movement. Sheltered behind their defenses, the British, with trifling loss to themselves, were able to 1779 inflict a loss of more than a thousand. D'Estaing was twice wounded; the gallant Pulaski, and Jasper, the hero of Fort Moultrie, were among the slain. The assault was a total failure and Prevost was made a major-general. October 9

Map of the Siege of Savannah

On the nineteenth of October, the dispirited Americans crossed the river; when they were safely over, the Clinton Sails for Charleston

1779 French embarked and sailed away. Between Savannah
1780 and Charleston, the inhabitants knew not where to find protection while the victorious redcoats fairly glowed with eagerness for plunder. Sir James Wright, the royal governor of Georgia who had fled in 1776, returned to rule his province; only in the interior did the spirit of armed resistance survive. Encouraged by these results,

December 26 Sir Henry Clinton left Lieutenant-general Knyphausen in command at New York and sailed with Earl Cornwallis and seventy-five hundred men for Charleston. By the end of January, most of the transports were at Tybee whence Clinton sent orders for Francis Rawdon Hastings, better known as Lord Rawdon, to come on from New York with his brigade of three thousand more. The British landed on the Carolina

February 11 coast about thirty miles below Charleston and crossed to James Island. At this time, the garrison of the city amounted to about twenty-two hundred regulars and one thousand militia, but, as Clinton did not advance for nearly a month, the Americans were able to bring up heavy reinforcements and to strengthen the defenses in the rear of the city. It was hoped that Commodore Whipple, who had in the harbor nine small vessels carrying one hundred and fifty guns, would be able to prevent the British fleet from crossing the bar and there was too much confidence in the neglected and almost worthless Fort Moultrie. 1780

On the twentieth of March, Admiral Arbuthnot's smaller ships crossed the bar without much difficulty, and Charleston Taken by the British most of Whipple's vessels were sunk by their own crews to obstruct the channel between the town and Shutes Folly Island, the guns and men of the squadron being transferred to the batteries on shore. On the ninth of 1780 April, in a furious thunder-storm, the British fleet hugged the shore of James Island, passed Fort Moultrie with a loss of only twenty-seven men and one ordnance vessel, and anchored under the guns of Fort Johnson within cannon-shot of the town. Meanwhile, the British land forces had crossed the Ashley and made good their position between the two rivers. Clinton demanded a surrender on the ninth, opened fire on the eleventh, slowly closed about the city, and made evacuation impossible. On the seventh of May, a force of seamen and marines captured Fort Moultrie. Resistance now became hopeless. On the eleventh of May, Lincoln surrendered the city and more than five thousand men. Among those who had been active in the defense of the city was Arthur Middleton, a signer of the declaration of independence. He was carried as a political prisoner to Saint Augustine and was later confined in the "Jersey" prison ship. He was exchanged before the end of the year and served in congress until the close of the war. 1780

Map of the Siege of Charleston

Coat of Arms of Arthur Middleton

Arthur Middleton and his Family

The loss of Charleston left South Carolina at the mercy of the enemy. Silver plate was carried off and, at one embarkation, two thousand negroes were sent to the West Indies for sale. A major-general's dividend of the spoil was more than four thousand guineas. Ninety Six, Camden, and other strategic places in the interior of the state were occupied and three expeditions sent into the up-country to encourage the loyalists and to overawe the rebellious. One of these went up the Savannah to Augusta; another to the district of Ninety Six; while the third and largest, led by Cornwallis, moved into the region north of the Santee. Cornwallis sent Lieutenant-colonel Tarleton, a dashing cavalry leader, with seven hundred mounted men in pursuit of Lieutenant-colonel Buford and the remnants of the American cavalry and some Virginia troops who had been too late to reinforce the garrison at Charleston. Tarleton's Quarter

Ban Tarleton

SOUTH-CAROLINA.

By Sir HENRY CLINTON, Knight of the Bath, General of His Majesty's Forces, and MARIOT ARBUTHNOT, Esquire, Vice-Admiral of the Blue, His Majesty's Commissioners to restore Peace and good Government in the several Colonies in Rebellion in North-America.

PROCLAMATION.

HIS MAJESTY having been pleased, by His Letters Patent, under the Great Seal of Great-Britain, to appoint us to be his Commissioners, to restore the Blessings of Peace and Liberty to the several Colonies in Rebellion in America, WE do hereby make public his most gracious Intentions, and in Obedience to his Commands, DO DECLARE, to such of his deluded Subjects, as have been perverted from their Duty by the Factious Arts of self-interested and ambitious Men, That they will still be received with Mercy and Forgiveness, if they immediately return to their Allegiance, and a due Obedience to those Laws and that Government which they formerly boasted was their best Birthright and noblest Inheritance, and upon a due Experience of the Sincerity of their Professions, a full and free Pardon will be granted for the treasonable Offences which they have heretofore committed, in such Manner and Form as his Majesty's Commission doth direct.

NEVERTHELESS, it is only to those, who, convinced of their Errors, are firmly resolved to return to and Support that Government under which they were formerly so happy and free, that these gracious Offers are once more renewed, and therefore those Persons are excepted, who, notwithstanding their present hopeless situation, and regardless of the accumulating Pressure of the Miseries of the People, which their infatuated Conduct must contribute to increase, are nevertheless still so hardened in their Guilt, as to endeavour to keep alive the Flame of Rebellion in this Province, which will otherwise soon be reinstated in its former Prosperity, Security, and Peace:

Nor can we at present resolve to extend the Royal Clemency to those who are polluted with the Blood of their Fellow Citizens, most wantonly and inhumanly shed under the mock Forms of Justice, because they refused Submission to an Usurpation which they abhorred, and would not oppose that Government with which they deemed themselves inseparably connected: And in order to give Quiet and Content to the Minds of his Majesty's faithful and well affected Subjects, WE do again assure them, that they shall have effectual Countenance, Protection and Support, and as soon as the Situation of the Province will admit, the Inhabitants will be reinstated in the Possession of their Rights and Immunities which they heretofore enjoyed under a free British Government, exempt from Taxation, except by their own Legislature: And we do hereby call upon all his Majesty's faithful Subjects to be aiding with their Endeavours, in order that a Measure, so conducive to their own Happiness, and the Welfare and Prosperity of the Province, may be the more speedily and easily attained.

GIVEN under our Hands and Seals, at Charles-Town, the First Day of June, in the Twentieth Year of His Majesty's Reign, and in the Year of Our Lord One Thousand Seven Hundred and Eighty.

HENRY CLINTON,

MARIOT ARBUTHNOT.

By their EXCELLENCY's Command,

JAMES SIMPSON, Secretary.

CHARLES-TOWN: Printed by ROBERTSON, MACDONALD & CAMERON, in Broad-Street, the Corner of Church-Street.

ONE OF THE PROCLAMATIONS ISSUED BY CLINTON AND ARBUTHNOT

Tarleton overtook Buford near the Waxhaw, not far from the North Carolina line, on the twenty-ninth of May. Buford and some of his men escaped, but of an unresisting five hundred who appealed for quarter, one hundred and thirteen were killed on the spot and one hundred and fifty "were too badly hacked to be moved." To this day, "Tarleton's quarter" is a familiar expression in that part of the Palmetto State. Sir Henry Clinton wrote to Germain: "I may venture to assert that there are few men in South Carolina who are not either our prisoners or in arms with us." 1780 June 4

Government by Proclamation

With skilful management, the British might now have held the state with but little further opposition. South Carolinians had accepted the declaration of independence in compliance with the wishes of the other colonies rather than from an enthusiastic desire for separation. As late as 1779, says McCrady, "their zeal and their fire were yet to be aroused." Their indifference was doubtless increased by a feeling of resentment at the other colonies for not having rendered more assistance. But the British policy was not wise. Proclamation followed proclamation with promises of pardon and benefits for the obedient and of punishments and confiscations for the refractory. In direct violation of the terms of the capitulation at Charleston, Clinton proclaimed as rebels all who refused the oath of allegiance, and required even prisoners on parole to take an active part in restoring the king's authority. He then sailed for New York leaving the southern command to Cornwallis. June 3

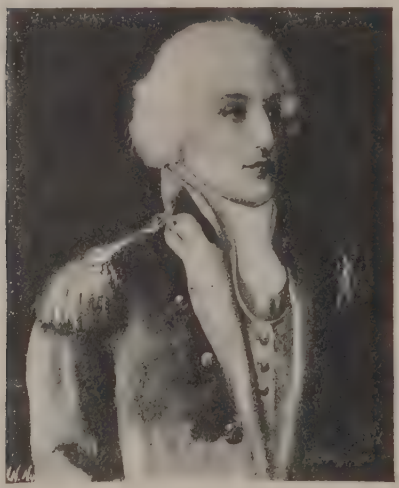

Partisan Warfare

A large part of the population was willing to remain neutral, but, when the issue was thus made up, it was natural that the South Carolina patriot, hopeless as he was, should say, "If I must fight, I will fight on the side of my countrymen." Organized resistance was out of the question, but it was not long before a system of partisan warfare was wearying the conquerors. "Sumter sounded the bugle among the hills on the Catawba and Broad Rivers; Marion's shrill whistle rang amid the swamps on the Pedee; and Pickens and Clarke called 1780 forth the brave sons of liberty upon the banks of the Saluda." Another of these partisan leaders was William R. Davie who had doffed a Princeton student's gown to take the sword in aid of the cause of American independence.

General Sumter

Thomas Sumter had been present at Braddock's defeat in 1755 and was made lieutenant-colonel of the second South Carolina regiment of riflemen in 1776. After the fall of Charleston, he hid in the Santee swamps, made his way to North Carolina, collected a band of refugees, and returned southward to harass the British. With him was Colonel William Neale, whose regiment Cornwallis was trying to force into the service of the king. Many of Neale's men joined their old commander and, with Whig recruits from the Waxhaw, swelled the partisan band to about six hundred; then Governor Rutledge made Sumter a brigadier-general of the state militia.

The Swamp Fox

Francis Marion had been well schooled in partisan and regular warfare. He had fought the Indians in 1761, had been with Moultrie at Charleston in 1776, and served in the disastrous expedition against Savannah in 1779. He later organized the force that became famous as "Marion's brigade," arming and equipping it as fortune permitted. At a country forge, old saws were rudely reshaped into sabers, and pewter mugs were molded into bullets. His men moved with almost superhuman swiftness and, when hard pressed, vanished in the woods and swamps only to reunite and strike a staggering blow before the search for them was ended. When they had no blankets, they slept on the ground; while other troops took up their beds and walked, they went on the double-quick without them. It is said that after a long and fruitless chase of Marion's men, the quick-moving Tarleton said: "Come boys, let us go back and find the game cock [meaning Sumter]; as for this damned swamp-fox, the devil himself could not catch him." The two epithets stuck where Tarleton put them. 1780

A Celtic Civil War

Toward the end of June, about thirteen hundred loyalists assembled at Ramsour's Mills, near the present Lincolnton, in North Carolina. Here they were attacked by a force of Whig militia and "acquaintances and old neighbors fought until nearly three hundred were killed or wounded." In South Carolina, most of the Scotch took the British side, while most of the up-country Scotch-Irish became Whigs. Tory and British parties went about pillaging and murdering and the Whigs equaled them in bitterness and ferocity. On the first of August, Sumter failed to capture a post at Rocky Mount; five days later, assisted by Davie, he attacked a force of five hundred British regulars and Tories at Hanging Rock. After the Tories had been put to flight and sixty-two of Tarleton's legion had been killed or wounded, Sumter's ill-disciplined men began a quest for liquor and plunder; then the enemy made a final assault and Sumter had to retreat. Then and there, an orphan boy of Scotch-Irish descent, Andrew Jackson, made his first appearance as a fighter. In twelve engagements during the month beginning the twelfth of July and ending the twelfth of August, about five hundred British were killed, wounded, or captured at a loss of not half that number of patriots. No other state suffered so much from the ravages of war as did South Carolina.

1780 During the war, "one hundred and thirty-seven battles, actions, and engagements took place in the state."

Gates Chosen to the Southern Command

About the middle of April, Baron de Kalb had been sent southward with about two thousand Maryland and Delaware troops. On the first of June, at Petersburg, Virginia, he heard of the fall of Charleston, but he pressed on and, by the twentieth of June, was at Hillsboro, North Carolina. Lincoln's surrender made it necessary for congress to appoint a new general to command in the South. Washington desired that General Greene should be named, but congress chose "the hero of Saratoga" for the task of "burgoyning Cornwallis." Gates accepted the position with confidence and received many congratulations. "Our affairs to the southward look blue," wrote Richard Peters, secretary of the board of war; "so they did when you took command before the Burgoynade. I can only now say, Go and do likewise—God bless you!" Charles Lee, with a shrewder appreciation of Gates's abilities, is said to have given the ominous warning: "Take care that your northern laurels do not change to southern willows."

A Caricature of Charles Lee

Gates Advances

Gates arrived at Hillsboro and succeeded Kalb on the twenty-fifth of July. Two days later he marched southward with what he called the "Grand Army." Contrary to the advice of his principal officers, he took the shorter route through the sand-hill region, a belt of pine barrens peopled largely with Tories, instead of the longer way through the fertile and friendly counties of Rowan and Mecklenburg.

On the seventh of August, he effected a junction with the North Carolina militia under Caswell and, by the thirteenth, was at Rugeley's Mills, twelve miles from Camden. He now had about fourteen hundred good troops and about nine hundred militia, many of whom had never been in action, and had just received bayonets in the use of which they had not been instructed. 1780

Gates Wastes Two Days

Meanwhile, Lord Rawdon had been gathering an inferior force of British in front of Camden. If Gates had moved forward at once, he might have overwhelmed Rawdon, but he wasted two days and then took up a position at Clermont. On the fourteenth, he was joined by seven hundred Virginia militia under Brigadier-general Stevens, and sent four hundred of his best troops to coöperate with Sumter in cutting the British line of communication, evidently hoping that he might surround the British as he had done Burgoyne. On the same day, Cornwallis reached Camden with reinforcements that brought his army up to about two thousand men.

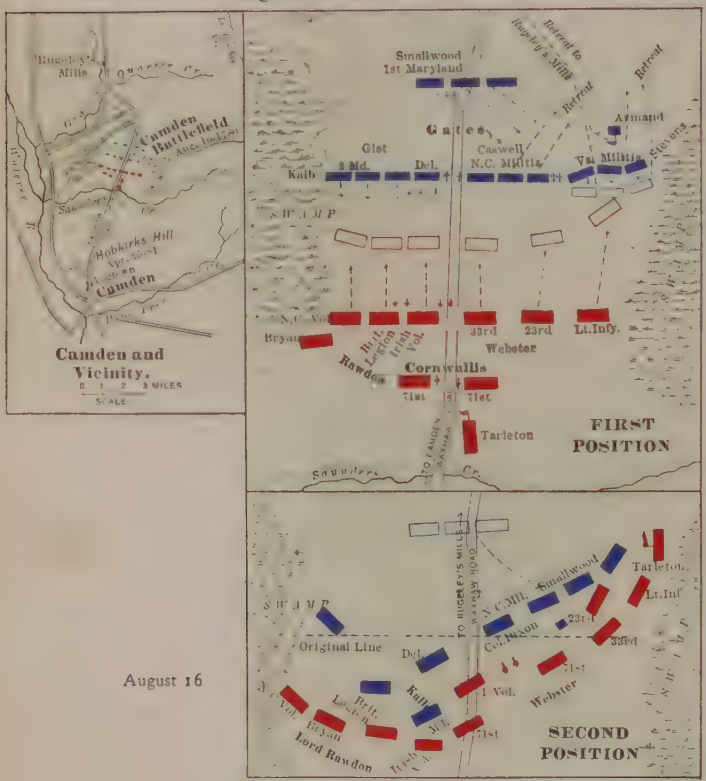

A Strange Coincidence

At ten o'clock on the evening of the fifteenth of August, Gates set out for Camden to attack Cornwallis, and Cornwallis set out from Camden to surprise Gates. The night was dark and sultry and both armies marched through the deep sand without sound of footfall. Between two and three in the morning, the two vans met near Saunders Creek. The surprise was mutual and the double attack simultaneous. Colonel Armand's French legion of the American van fled panic-stricken, but the Virginia and the North Carolina militia closed in from the flanks and checked the advance of the enemy. The two armies deployed across the road and waited for daylight. Hearing from a prisoner that the British numbered three thousand men, Gates called a council of war and asked what ought to be done. "Well, gentlemen, is it not too late now to do anything but fight?" asked Stevens.

The Battle of Camden

The British army had crossed Saunders Creek; their rear and both flanks were protected by swamps. The Americans were in an open wood and both flanks were exposed. The situation was singularly favorable to 1780 Cornwallis with a force that was weaker in numbers but superior in discipline and efficiency. On the American right were Kalb and Gist with the continentals and Dixon's North Carolina regiment; on the left were Caswell and Stevens with their militia brigades. On the British left was Lord Rawdon while on the right, opposed to Gates's untried militia, Cornwallis placed his best troops under his best officer, Lieutenant-colonel Webster. Gates appears to have fought with no definite plan and the result was a rout rather than a battle. The American left fled at the first onset and the regulars on the right were cut to pieces or driven from the field. Brave old Kalb, unhorsed and fighting on foot, fell pierced with eleven wounds and died three days later. Gates fled with such precipitation that that night he was at Charlotte, sixty miles away. In less than four days he was at Hillsboro one hundred and eighty miles distant, without even an escort. Here he began the work of gathering up the fragments of his broken army. Few disasters were ever more complete. With a loss slightly in excess of three hundred, the

Map of the Battle of Camden

August 16

British had killed and wounded about a thousand and had captured as many more, besides seven cannons, two thousand muskets, and Gates's entire baggage train. The laurels of Saratoga had indeed changed into willows. Cornwallis retired to Camden. 1780

The Ubiquitous Tarleton

Stunning as was the blow, it was quickly followed by another. On the day before the battle, Sumter captured Cornwallis's supply train at the Wateree and took more than a hundred prisoners. He then retreated up the Wateree River to Fishing Creek where he was surprised by Tarleton. All the booty and prisoners were lost, a hundred and fifty Americans were killed and wounded, and upwards of three hundred were captured. On the same day, however, Isaac Shelby, Elijah Clarke, and James Williams with a partisan force inflicted a crushing defeat on four or five hundred British and Tories at Musgrove's Mills. Two days later, the wily Marion dashed upon a British detachment, captured twenty-six, released a hundred and fifty Marylanders taken at Camden, and escaped with the loss of only two men wounded. August 18

Cornwallis Advances to Charlotte

After spending nearly a month at Camden during which time the troops suffered greatly from heat and fever, Cornwallis pushed on with the main army to Charlotte early in September. In the meantime, Tarleton moved northward between the Catawba and the Broad and joined Cornwallis. With a force composed of northern and southern Tories, Major Patrick Ferguson, an able Scotch officer, operated among the foot-hills of the mountains.

Ferguson's Misplay

In attempting to cut off a force under Colonel Clarke who had followed up the success at Musgrove's Mills by making an unsuccessful attack on Augusta and had then retreated northward, Ferguson pushed far to the westward into a semi-wilderness as far as a place called Gilbert Town, near the present Rutherfordton in North Carolina. While here, having heard that some of the over-mountain men had been at Musgrove's Mills, he paroled a prisoner who was a distant relative of Isaac Shelby and sent him to tell the people of Watauga that 1780 if they did not desist from opposing the king he would march over the mountains, hang their leaders, and lay waste their country with fire and sword.

The Over-mountain Men

After their victory at Musgrove's Mills, Shelby, Clarke, and Williams had formed a tentative plan to raise a force and attack Ferguson; Ferguson's threat was what was needed to bring the necessary men into the field. Sycamore Shoals on the Watauga River was September 25 selected as the rendezvous and the appointed day saw a strange assemblage. Colonel William Campbell was there with four hundred men from southwestern Virginia. Colonel Charles McDowell was there with about a hundred and sixty refugee Whigs. Practically the whole population of the Watauga region attended. Shelby and Sevier each had a company of two hundred and forty men. The danger from the Cherokees was too great to allow all to go, but the young men came to enroll themselves for the campaign while the old men who were to be left behind came to encourage the youthful soldiers and to receive instructions for the defense of the stations. Most of the volunteer riflemen were clad in homespun and wore the hunting-shirt characteristic of the backwood soldiery. Each one owned the rifle that he bore and knew the horse that carried him.

Whig versus Tory

On the morning of the twenty-sixth and under the leadership of Colonel Campbell, the whole force set out for Gilbert Town where Ferguson was supposed to be.

September 30 At the Catawba River, they were joined by about three hundred and fifty men from North Carolina under Colo-

October 6 nel Cleaveland, and at the Cowpens, by four hundred more from South Carolina. Meanwhile, two deserters informed Ferguson of the American approach. Ferguson at once sent to Ninety Six for reinforcements, hastened messengers to Cornwallis informing him of the situation, recalled his furloughed men, and fell back slowly toward Charlotte. On the sixth of October, he encamped on King's Mountain, a rocky plateau about six hundred yards long and about sixty feet above the level of the surrounding country—a position so strong that he is said to have declared that "all the rebels outside of hell" could not drive him from it. On the evening of the same day, Colonel Campbell selected his best-mounted men and, leaving the rest to follow, pushed forward from the Cowpens to fight Ferguson wherever he could find him. The command marched all night and so timed their movements that Ferguson was almost surrounded before he knew of the presence of his enemy. Ferguson's command had been recruited from the loyalist population; Draper says that Ferguson himself was probably the only British soldier present. The impending battle was to be fought between Whigs and Tories; he who loses need little hope for mercy. 1780

The Battle of King's Mountain

On the afternoon of the seventh of October, the Americans dismounted, secured their horses under guard and out of gunshot, and advanced to the attack. From different sides of the hill they crept up the wooded slopes, firing when they saw an enemy. Colonel Campbell threw off his coat and cried: "There they are, my brave boys; shout like hell and fight like devils!" The order seems to have been literally obeyed. Three times were the assailants driven back by desperate bayonet charges only to reform their lines, return to fight, and to repay twofold the slaughter that swept down from the hilltop. Ferguson behaved with great gallantry, rushing from point to point to encourage his men. Twice the Tories ran up white flags and twice Ferguson cut them down. Rather early in the action, he fell, pierced by half a dozen balls and the command passed to Captain Abraham de Peyster, a New York Tory, of "The King's American Regiment." After the action had raged for more than an hour, the enemy displayed the white flag and asked for quarter. Just then, a foraging party that Ferguson had sent out began an attack on the American rear—an adequate reason for continuing the action although the foe in front was begging for quarter. At all events, some of the Whigs shouted "Give 'em Buford's play," and it was some time before the slaughter ceased. Had King's Mountain been a British 1780 victory, some American historians would have called it a "massacre."

The Effect of the Battle

The British force had been completely enveloped and few if any of the Tories escaped; about nine hundred were killed, wounded or taken. The Whig loss was officially reported at twenty-eight killed and sixty wounded; the loss was probably greater. The Americans captured arms largely in excess of the British loss in men, Ferguson having had a surplus supply for the arming of the loyalist recruits who flocked to his army as it advanced through the country. The victors slept upon the field and, at dawn of the next day, buried the dead. On the morning of the ninth, the hurried homeward march was begun, victors and vanquished alike half famished. On the thirteenth, a court was improvised, thirty or forty of the hated Carolina Tories were sentenced to death, and nine were hung in retaliation for Cornwallis's execution of influential patriots. The battle of King's Mountain cost Cornwallis a quarter of his army and changed the course of the war in the South. Cornwallis fell back from Charlotte to Winnsboro between Camden and Ninety Six, and "the hero of Saratoga," following at a respectful distance, placed the remnants of his "grand army" in camp at Charlotte. 1780

Map of the Battle of King's Mountain

Sunday, October 8

Small as were the numbers engaged, the battle of King's Mountain was one of the most important of the war. Congress was sending needed aid; as hope rose in the hearts of the southern patriots, they increased their activities. Among the reinforcements was Colonel Daniel Morgan. No man except Arnold had done so much in the conflicts with Burgoyne, but in its distribution of rewards, congress had ignored him. Justly indignant at this ingratitude, Morgan resigned his command and retired to his home in Virginia. In June, 1780, congress directed that he should be reëmployed in the southern army but Morgan showed no eagerness to serve again under "the hero of Saratoga." After the disaster at Camden, his patriotism got the better of his indignation and he hastened to the front; he arrived at Hillsboro in September and congress soon made him a brigadier-general. Morgan

At Valley Forge, in March, 1778, General Greene had accepted the thankless offer of quartermaster-general, reserving the right to command on the field of battle as he did at Monmouth. In August, 1780, he resigned that office and, in October, he was appointed to the command at West Point, a place made vacant by Arnold's treason as will be related in the next chapter. When the failure of Gates's southern campaign forced the choice of a new commander, all eyes turned toward Greene as his successor. On his way to his new command, Greene left Steuben in Virginia to recruit and organize a force as quickly as possible. Washington said: "I think I am giving you a general, but what can a general do without men, without arms, without clothing, Greene 1780 without stores, without provisions." But the "gift" of the general changed the aspect of affairs. Greene relieved Gates at Charlotte on the second of December. He was destined not to win a single victory where he personally commanded and yet to emerge from the southern conflict with the reputation of being the second soldier of the Revolution.

CHAPTER X

THE WAR IN THE NORTH, 1779–1780

Washington's Army in Winter Quarters

AFTER the battle of Monmouth, Washington had taken up his headquarters at White Plains whence, in September, he sent to congress a copy of the report of a board of officers that he had appointed "to consider what would be the most eligible plan for invading Canada." A few weeks later, he received "a plan and sundry resolutions of Congress for attacking Canada the next Campaign" and replied expressing his disapproval of the plan. Later in the month, he reported that his army was in motion to the places of the respective cantonments for winter quarters. Nine brigades were to be stationed on the west side of the Hudson, exclusive of the garrison at West Point, seven at Middlebrook, and one at Elizabethtown to cover the lower part of Jersey. Six brigades were to be stationed at West Point and east of the Hudson, for the immediate defense of the Highlands and the protection of the country lying along the sound. In closing his communication, Washington said: "The Troops must again have recourse to the expedient of hutting, as they did last year. But, as they are now well clad, and we have had more leisure to make some little preparations for winter-quarters, I hope they will be in a more comfortable situation, than they were in the preceding winter."

November 11, 1778

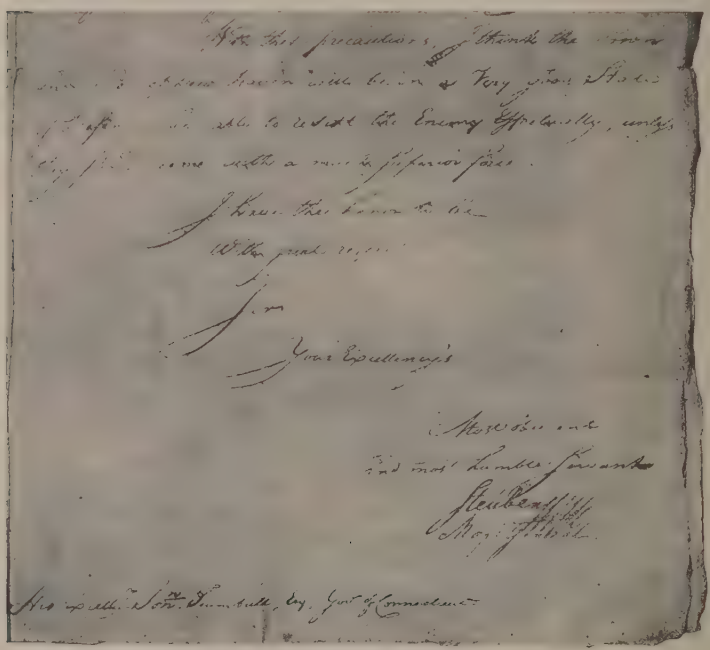

A Gloomy Outlook

On the twenty-seventh of March, 1779, Washington wrote to George Mason: "I have seen without despondency even for a momt.—the hours which America have 1779 stiled her gloomy ones, but I have beheld no day since the commencement of hostilities that I have thought her liberties in such eminent danger as at present. . . . Indeed we seem to be verging so fast to destruction that I am filled with sensations to which I have been a stranger till within these three months."

Washington's Description of the Situation

In other letters, Washington bitterly regretted the unpatriotic trading carried on by Americans with the enemy, the shameless stock-jobbing, extortion, forestalling, and other low arts and devices resorted to by speculators. "From what I have seen, heard, and in part know," he wrote, "I should in one word say that idleness, dissipation, and extravagance seem to have laid fast hold of most; that speculation, peculation, and an insatiable thirst for riches, seem to have got the better of almost every other consideration and almost every order of men; and that

Portion of last page of Letter from Baron Steuben to Governor Jonathan Trumbull

BRITISH CARTOON, "THE P

(Published in the Westminster Magazine, June, 1779. Shows the Saratoga su of the New York His s and POLITICS, during and at the close of the last Session 1779.

OLITICAL RAREE-SHOW" render among the twelve incidents caricatured. From copy in collection torical Society) party disputes and personal quarrels are the great business of the day."

1779

In the North, the military operations of 1779 and 1780 were hardly of sufficient importance to be dignified with the name of a campaign. Blockaded by Washington in New York, the British contented themselves with occasional marauding expeditions that caused great destruction of property and much suffering but produced no important results. In May, 1779, General Matthews with a force of about twenty-five hundred men laid waste Portsmouth and Norfolk in Virginia, destroyed more than a hundred vessels, and returned to New York with seventeen prizes and about three thousand hogsheads of tobacco. In July, General Tryon with about twenty-six hundred men and assisted by a fleet under Sir George Collier burned the ships in the harbor of New Haven and many warehouses in the town; he also burned Fairfield, Green Farms, and Norwalk, and then returned to New York.

Fire and Sword

Map of Tryon's Raid into Connecticut in 1779

Some weeks before Tryon's raid into Connecticut, Sir

Stony Point

1779

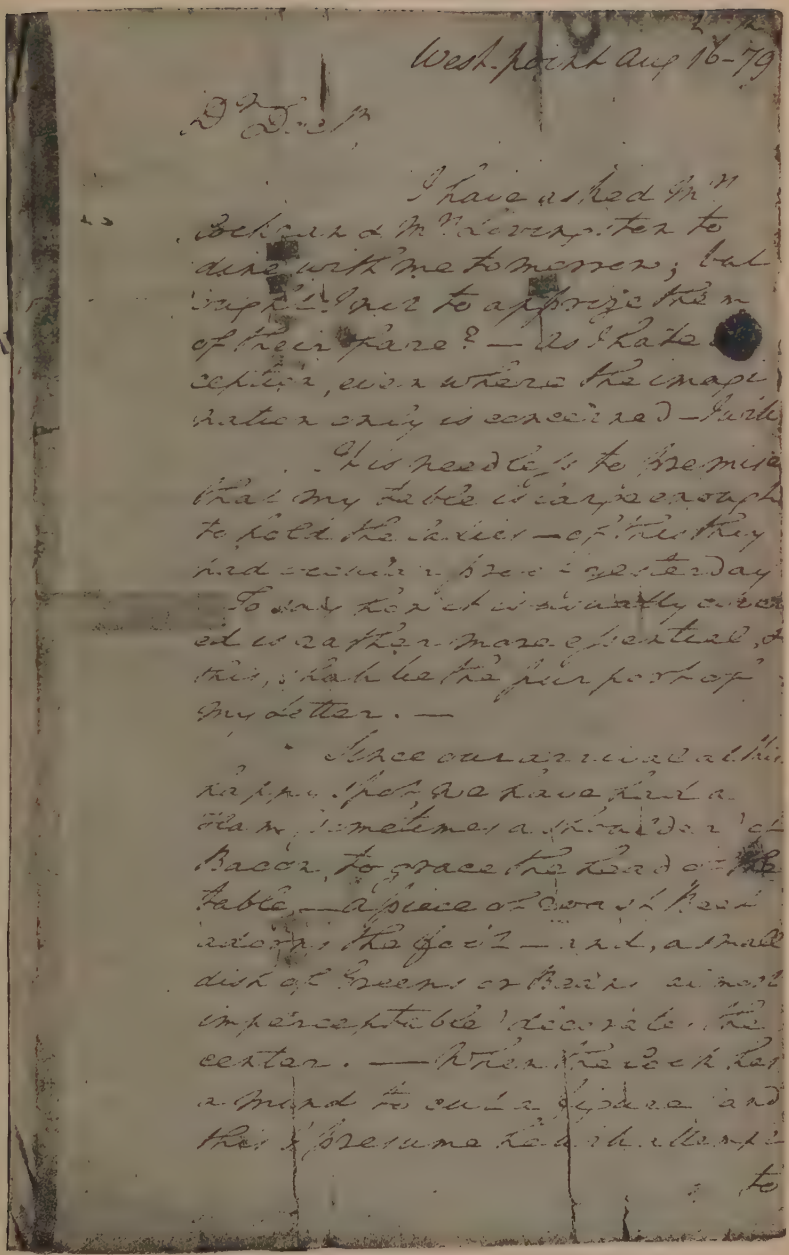

Map of the Capture of Stony Point

May 31–June 1

Henry Clinton had seized Verplanck Point and Stony Point, posts that defended the lower passage to the High-

Medal awarded to Anthony Wayne for the Capture of Stony Point

West Point Aug 16-79

Dr Dick

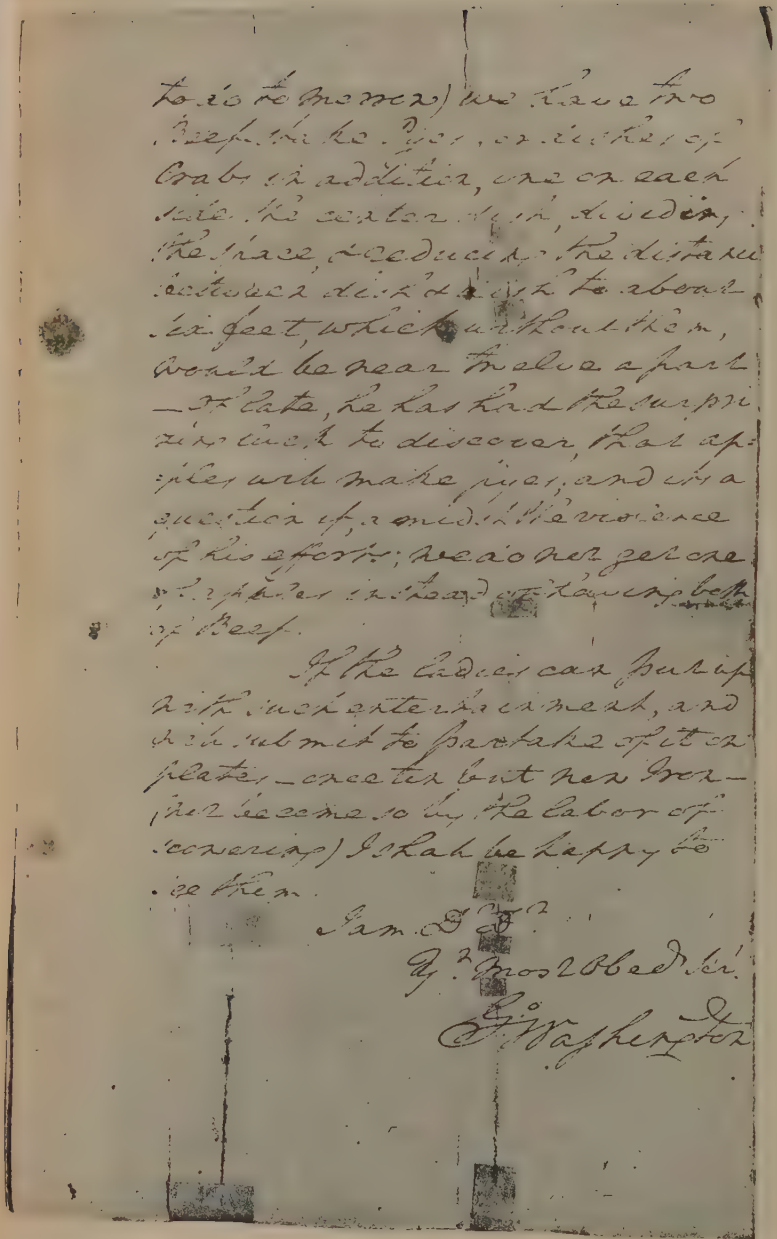

I have asked Mr Lear
& Mr Harper to dine with me to-morrow; but expect I shall to apprize them of their fare? — Do Kate scrape, even where the snaps water only is procured — Pork

You need not to be remin that my table will carry enough to feed the Lairds — of Turkey and venison I presume yesterday
To say how it is usually cover ed would be rather more than this sheet will hold the purport of my letter. —

Since our arrival at this place we have had a
Ham, sometimes a Shoulder of Bacon, to grace the head of the table — a piece of corned beef more by the dozen — and, a small dish of Greens or Beans or more unexceptionable vegetable, the season. — Then the cook has a mind to cut a figure and then I presume he has the whole to

GEORGE WASHINGTON'S AUTOGRAPH LETTER TO DOCTOR
(From collection of the New

COCHRAN, DATED AT WEST POINT, AUGUST 16, 1779 York Historical Society)

lands. Washington determined to retake Stony Point which had been strengthened by the British and contained a garrison of about six hundred men. Early in the morning of the sixteenth of July, General Wayne, with about twelve hundred light infantry, carried the fortress with the bayonet without firing a gun and with a loss of only ninety-eight in killed and wounded —one of the most brilliant exploits of the war. Clinton soon again ascended the river with a large force and the Americans evacuated Stony Point which was reoccupied by the British. In the same month, Massachusetts, with some assistance from congress and New Hampshire, sent an expedition against the British post at the site of Castine, Maine; August saw the total failure of the venture. On the night of the nineteenth of August, Major Henry Lee, "Light Horse Harry," stormed Paulus Hook where Jersey City now stands and killed or captured more than two hundred of the enemy. Washington's army spent the winter of 1779–80 at Morristown, fighting cold, nakedness, and famine as they had done at Valley Forge although there was an abundance of food in the country.

1779
1780

Map of the Penobscot Expedition

Paulus Hook

The year 1780 was not marked by more important military operations in the North than 1779 had been. In the intervening winter, Sir Henry Clinton had sailed southward as related in the preceding chapter. On the sixth of June, Knyphausen crossed from Staten Island to New Jersey with about five thousand troops and, before

Knyphausen's Advance into New Jersey

1780 daylight, pushed on toward Elizabethtown. He had heard of the mutinous spirit bred by famine in the American army and had misinterpreted its meaning and probable effect. On the seven-mile march from Elizabethtown to Connecticut Farms, the New Jersey militia appeared as if by magic, single riflemen firing upon the British column from behind trees, thickets, fences, and houses, and inflicting serious loss. When Knyphausen was within half a mile of Springfield, he found that General Maxwell was on the bank of the Rahway, that Washington was posted in force at the Short Hills in the rear, and that the whole country was aroused. Night came on, dark and rainy, the village of Connecticut Farms, including church

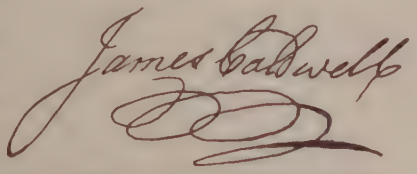

"Camp Kettle of General Anthony Wayne, who inherited it from Susan Hubberd, grandmother of his wife. By bequest from Wayne it descended to his grand-niece, Mrs. Eli Lewis of Edgemont, Delaware Co., Penna., and she bequeathed it to Washington L. Atlee, M. D., who presented it to the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, November 10, 1873."

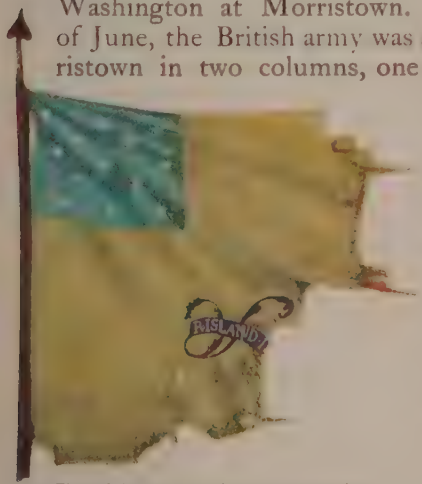

View of Paulus Hook
(Facsimile from a water color painted by a British officer during the Revolution. From a print supplied by Dr. Thomas Addis Emmet)

and parsonage, was burned, the wife of Chaplain Caldwell was killed, and, before morning, Knyphausen and his army were held back from Staten Island only by the fact that the tide was out and the shore covered with deep mud that the cavalry could not cross. That his precipitate retreat might not be represented as a flight, the British general decided to stay a few days longer in New Jersey and strengthened his position with intrenchments. 1780

Autograph of the Reverend James Caldwell

Ten days later, Sir Henry Clinton arrived at Staten Island from the South and at once resolved to attack Washington at Morristown. On the twenty-third of June, the British army was advancing toward Morristown in two columns, one by the Vauxhall road, the other by the Springfield road; Clinton's whole force consisted of about five thousand infantry, with cavalry and eighteen pieces of artillery. At the first bridge on the Springfield road, Colonel Angell's Rhode Island regiment made a stout resistance but was forced back. At the second bridge, Angell's and Shreve's men made obstinate resistance, but were finally driven back upon the brigades of Stark and Maxwell. Irving tells us that no one showed more ardor in the fight than the lately bereaved Chaplain Caldwell who, when the soldiers were in want of wadding, distributed hymn-books and Watts's psalms with the pastoral injunc- The Battle of Springfield

Flag of the Second Rhode Island Regiment
(Israel Angell was the only colonel it had)

Map of the Battle of Springfield

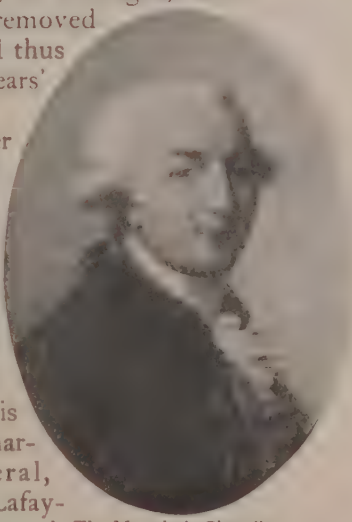

Webb's Third Connecticut Regiment Flag used during the Revolutionary War

(Now owned by The Pennsylvania Society of Sons of the Revolution, by whose courteous permission it is reproduced in colors in facsimile of its present appearance)

tion, "Put Watts into them, boys." On the other road, the British were checked at the bridge by Major Lee's cavalry covered by Colonel Ogden's regiment. Greene, who was in command, soon found that he could not hold so long a line and took post on a range of hills in the rear of Byram's tavern where the two roads were nearer together so that aid could be sent from one to the other. He thus was able to detach Webb's regiment under Lieutenant-colonel Huntington, and Colonel Henry Jackson's regiment with one piece of artillery. The advance of the British was checked and Springfield was burned; at midnight, Clinton's army crossed to Staten Island, removed the bridge of boats behind them, and thus relieved New Jersey of her five years' warfare. 1780

The Marquis de Chastellux

In the following month, the chevalier de Ternay with a French fleet and the count de Rochambeau with about six thousand troops arrived at Newport. Fleet and troops had been sent largely through the efforts of Lafayette who, in February, had returned to France for a short visit. With Rochambeau came François Jean Chastellux, marquis, major-general, and relative of Lafayette. Other French troops who were to follow were blockaded in the port of Brest, and a British fleet under Admiral Arbuthnot promptly blockaded Newport. Rochambeau was therefore unable to render any assistance of

Rochambeau's Arrival

Advance of British Army from Staten Island

1780 importance that year. The blockade had its compensations for the cooped-up French gallants. According to the Memoirs and Recollections of the count de Segur, Newport "offered delightful circles composed of enlightened men, and of handsome women, whose talents heightened their personal attractions. All the French officers who knew them recollect the names and beauty of Miss Champlain, the two Misses Hunter," and of several others among whom he mentions Polly Lawton, a Quaker "nymph" and "a pious virgin" possessed of "the most graceful figure and the most beautiful form imaginable."

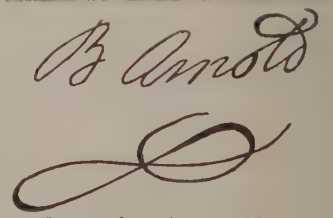

Polly Lawton

Rochambeau wrote to Vergennes: "Upon our arrival here, the country was in consternation. . . I spoke to the principal persons of the place, and told them, as I write to General Washington, that this was merely the advanced guard of a greater force, and that the king is determined to support them with his whole power. In twenty-four hours their spirits rose, and last night all the streets, houses, and steeples were illuminated in the midst of fire-works and the greatest rejoicings. . . . Send us troops, ships, and money;

Rochambeau's Report

From a private plate owned by Dr. Thomas Addis Emmet but do not depend upon these people, nor upon their means; they have neither money nor credit." As will be explained more fully in a later chapter, the continental credit was exhausted and the continental currency was worthless. "Throughout the land there was a weariness of war, a desire for peace at any price." At this, the moment of deepest gloom, when even Washington was trembling for the immediate future of America, came the startling news that Benedict Arnold had gone over to the enemy. 1778 1780

Arnold in Command at Philadelphia

Arnold's treason, in some respects the most dramatic and tragic event of the Revolution, presents a tempting study in psychology. To understand it we must know the man and find the causes that led him into treason. After the evacuation of Philadelphia, Arnold, unfit for active service by reason of the wound received at Saratoga, was placed in command of that city. He was a brave man and a superb soldier, but he was deficient in tact; the appointment was unfortunate. It brought him into direct contact with congress against which he had a grievance, and the command itself was difficult. He soon fell out with the state government and lost much of the personal credit with which he began.

Courtship, Marriage, and Extravagance

His unpopularity was increased by his associates and his manner of living. Soon after his arrival in the city, he became enamoured of Margaret Shippen, better known as "Peggy" Shippen, a young lady who had taken part with André in the Mischianza. Her father, Edward Shippen, a gentleman of rank and fortune, was regarded as a moderate loyalist; after the war, he became chief-justice of Pennsylvania. Miss Shippen was vivacious, tender-hearted, and pretty; even after the troubles of years, she was described by Colonel Tarleton as the most beautiful woman in England. Arnold was a widower of thirty-seven; she was not yet twenty. Naturally fond of ostentation, Arnold was incited to even greater extravagance by his desire to create a favorable impression upon Miss Shippen, her family, and friends. In September, 1778, he made a formal request for her hand, and, in

Drawn by Major L'Enfant, Engineer "A View of West Point on 1778 time, was accepted. "No doubt, the imagination of 1779 Miss Shippen was excited, and her heart captivated by the oft repeated stories of his gallant deeds, his feats of brilliant courage, and traits of generosity and kindness, such as his contributions towards the education of the orphan children of General Warren." In the following spring, he bought Mount Pleasant, a country place that John Adams described as "the most elegant seat in Pennsylvania;" two weeks later, he was married. In his new residence, he continued to give splendid entertainments that were costly beyond his means and involved him in debt. Then, too, congress refused to allow some of his claims on account of the northern campaign and thus completed his financial ruin.

March 22, 1779

Charges against Arnold

Irritated by the criticism to which he was subjected, Arnold had formed a plan of resigning from the army and building up in western New York an estate similar to General Schuyler's. The project was well under way and he had set out for New York to further the enterprise when, early in February, 1779, at Washington's camp on the Raritan, he heard that the executive council of Pennsylvania had sent to congress a list of charges and grievances against him. Being thus assailed, Arnold felt that he could not retire from the army until he had been vindicated.

Two Committees and a Court Martial

After investigating the charges, a congressional committee exculpated Arnold from all criminality and intentional wrong and reported that only two of the charges

Hudsons River," 1780 From facsimile in Boynton's History of West Point were worthy of attention; on one occasion, Arnold had irregularly permitted a vessel to come into port and once he had used some Pennsylvania wagons for the transportation of private property. Arnold had enemies in congress and the president and executive council of Pennsylvania were virulently hostile. Congress referred the matter to a joint committee composed of some of its own members and the Pennsylvania council. This committee reported several resolutions intended to soothe Pennsylvania and recommended that four of the charges be referred to a court martial. In spite of Arnold's urgent entreaties, the court did not assemble until the nineteenth of December. Its verdict agreed with that returned by the first committee of congress in acquitting Arnold of all intentional wrong. It found, however, that Arnold had acted without authority in the matter of the ship and, as to the wagons, that he intended his application as a private request and had no design of employing them "otherwise than at his own private expense, nor of defrauding the public, nor of injuring or impeding the public service; but considering the delicacy attending the high station in which he acted, and that requests from him might operate as commands, the court were of opinion the request was imprudent and improper, and therefore ought not to have been made." 1779 1780 January 26, 1780

These were trivial charges on which to humiliate a soldier who before Quebec, off Valcour Island, and against Burgoyne had been the bravest of the brave, and Sentenced to be Reprimanded 1780 who now was and always would be a cripple from the wounds he had received. The times were unsettled, the limits of authority were not clearly fixed, and many a model officer had been guilty of irregularities far more serious. No turpitude had been proved against him. His brilliant exploits should have pleaded in his favor, secured indulgence, and mitigated personal animosity. But, "as a sort of lame concession to the Council of Pennsylvania," the court sentenced him to receive a reprimand from the commander-in-chief.

January 26

It Might Have Been

Washington turned the reprimand into an eulogy, but "the damage was done." Arnold had expected a full acquittal. Had he stifled his resentment and fought on, or had he resigned from the service and gone into private life, he would long since have been justified at the bar of history. But his wounds of body were painful, his disposition had been soured by disappointment, and he had many Tory friends. Marlborough and General Monck changed sides; why not I? The prospects of American success were gloomy and, if he could manage to restore British authority, there were few honors to which he might not aspire. A sense of injustice "rankled and irritated until it poisoned and prepared the way for the consummation of his crime."

House of Beverly Robinson

TO THE INHABITANTS OF AMERICA.

I SHOULD forfeit even in my own opinion, the place I have so long held in yours, if I could be indifferent to your approbation, and silent on the motives which have induced me to join the King's arms.

A very few words however shall suffice upon a subject so personal, for to the thousands who suffer under the Tyranny of the Usurpers in the revolted provinces as well as to the great multitude, who have long wished for their subversion, this instance of my conduct can want no vindication, and as to that class of men who are criminally protracting the war from sinister views at the expence of the public interest, I prefer their enmity to their applause. I am therefore only concerned in this address to explain myself to such of my countrymen, as want abilities or opportunities to detect the artifices by which they are duped.

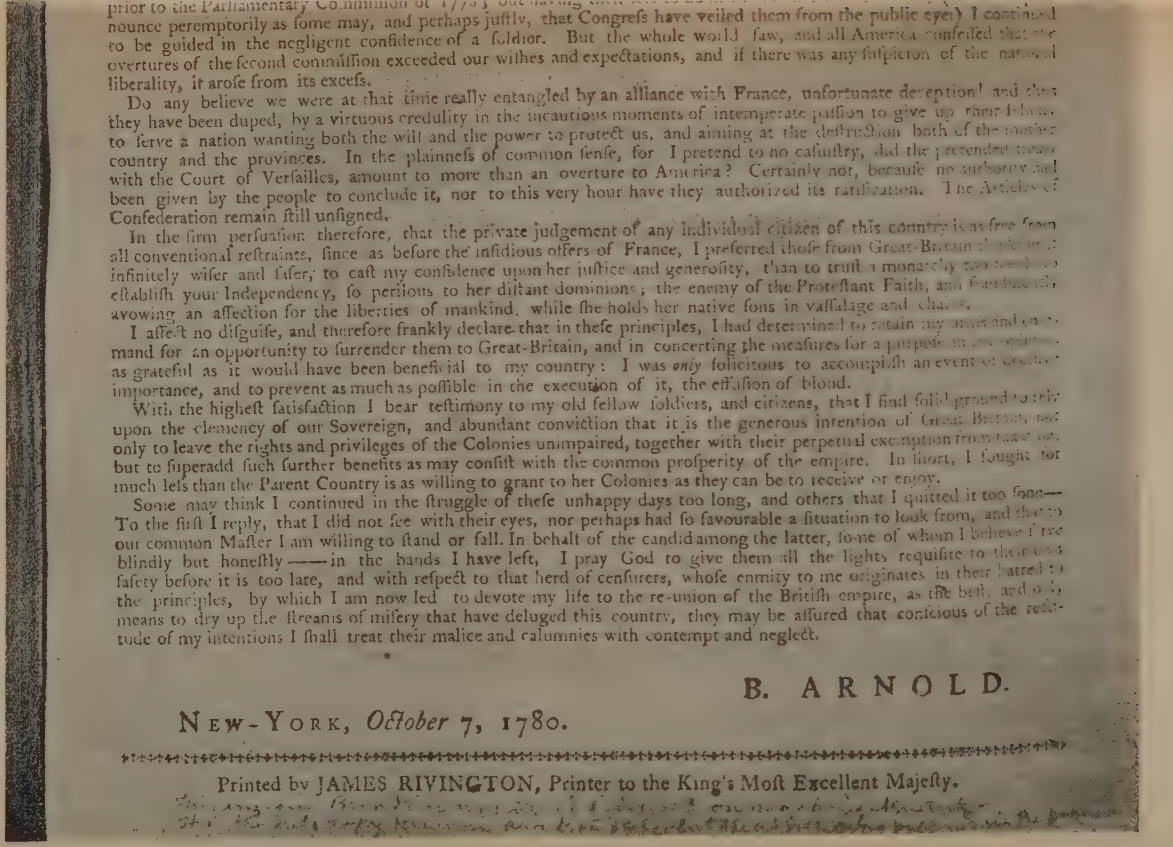

Having fought by your side when the love of our country animated our arms, I shall expect from your justice and candor, what your deceivers with more art and less honesty, will find it inconsistent with their own views to admit.

When I quitted domestic happiness for the perils of the field, I conceived the rights of my country in danger, and that duty and honour called me to her defence. A redress of grievances was my only object and aim, however I acquiesced in a step which I thought precipitate, the declaration of independence: To justify this measure many plausible reasons were urged, which could no longer exist, when Great-Britain with the open arms of a parent offered to embrace us as children, and grant the wished for redress.

And now that her worst enemies are in her own bosom I should change my principles, if I conspired with their designs. yourselves being judges, was the war the less just, because fellow subjects were considered as our foes? You have felt the torture in which we raised our arms against a brother, God incline the guilty protractors of these unnatural dissentions, to resign their ambition, and cease from their delusions, in compassion to kindred blood.

I anticipate your question, was not the war a defensive one until the French joined in the combination? I answer, that I thought so. You will add was it not afterwards necessary, till the separation of the British empire was completed? by no means, in contending for the welfare of my country I am free to declare my opinion, that this end attained, all strife should have ceased.

I lamented therefore the impolicy, tyranny and injustice, which with a sovereign contempt of the people of America, studiously neglected to take their collective sentiments of the British proposals of peace, and to negociate under a suspension of arms, for an adjustment of differences, as a dangerous sacrifice of the great interests of this country to the partial views of a proud, ancient and crafty foe. I had my suspicions of some imperfection in our counsels, on proposals prior to the Parliamentary Commission of 1778; but having nounce peremptorily as some may, and perhaps justly, that Congress have veiled them from the public eye) I continued to be guided in the negligent confidence of a soldier. But the whole world saw, and all America confessed that our overtures of the second commission exceeded our wishes and expectations, and if there was any suspicion of the natural liberality, it arose from its excess.

Do any believe we were at that time really entangled by an alliance with France, unfortunate deception! and that they have been duped, by a virtuous credulity in the incautious moments of intemperate passion to give up their liberties, to serve a nation wanting both the will and the power to protect us, and aiming at the destruction both of the mother country and the provinces. In the plainness of common sense, for I pretend to no casuistry, did the pretended treaty with the Court of Versailles, amount to more than an overture to America? Certainly not, because no authority had been given by the people to conclude it, nor to this very hour have they authorized its ratification. The Articles of Confederation remain still unsigned.

In the firm persuasion therefore, that the private judgement of any individual citizen of this country is as free from all conventional restraints, since as before the insidious offers of France, I preferred those from Great-Britain [illegible] infinitely wiser and safer, to cast my confidence upon her justice and generosity, than to trust a monarchy too [illegible] establish your Independency, so perilous to her distant dominions; the enemy of the Protestant Faith, and [illegible] avowing an affection for the liberties of mankind, while she holds her native sons in vassalage and chains.

I affect no disguise, and therefore frankly declare that in these principles, I had determined to retain my [illegible] mand for an opportunity to surrender them to Great-Britain, and in concerting the measures for a purpose [illegible] as grateful as it would have been beneficial to my country: I was only solicitous to accomplish an event [illegible] importance, and to prevent as much as possible in the execution of it, the effusion of blood.

With the highest satisfaction I bear testimony to my old fellow soldiers, and citizens, that I find solid ground to rely upon the clemency of our Sovereign, and abundant conviction that it is the generous intention of Great Britain, not only to leave the rights and privileges of the Colonies unimpaired, together with their perpetual exemption from taxation, but to superadd such further benefits as may consist with the common prosperity of the empire. In short, I fought for much less than the Parent Country is as willing to grant to her Colonies as they can be to receive or enjoy.

Some may think I continued in the struggle of these unhappy days too long, and others that I quitted it too soon—
To the first I reply, that I did not see with their eyes, nor perhaps had so favourable a situation to look from, and that to our common Master I am willing to stand or fall. In behalf of the candid among the latter, some of whom I believe I [illegible] blindly but honestly ——in the bands I have left, I pray God to give them all the lights requisite to their own safety before it is too late, and with respect to that herd of censurers, whose enmity to me originates in their hatred to the principles, by which I am now led to devote my life to the re-union of the British empire, as the best, and only means to dry up the streams of misery that have deluged this country, they may be assured that conscious of the rectitude of my intentions I shall treat their malice and calumnies with contempt and neglect.

B. ARNOLD.

NEW-YORK, October 7, 1780.

Printed by JAMES RIVINGTON, Printer to the King's Most Excellent Majesty.

BROADSIDE BY BENEDICT ARNOLD

(An address to the inhabitants of America, vindicating his conduct. Reproduced from the only known broadside copy of this publication in the New York Public Library, Emmet Collection. The address was published in certain papers of that time)

VILLEFRANCHE'S PLAN OF WEST POINT
From facsimile in Boynton's History of West Point

1780

A Treasonable Correspondence

It is probable that Arnold's first communications with the enemy were in the spring or summer of 1779 when he was vainly seeking a prompt trial. Which side made the first overtures is unknown. At this time, Arnold was merely playing with fire; had he been acquitted by the court he probably would not have been burned by the fire. After the trial, the correspondence was resumed. The letters were elaborately disguised and couched in well-understood commercial phrases. Arnold signed his letters "Gustavus," and Major John André, who acted for Sir Henry Clinton, used the pen-name "John Anderson." At first, Arnold seems to have thought merely of personal defection; then he decided to strike a heavier blow.

John André

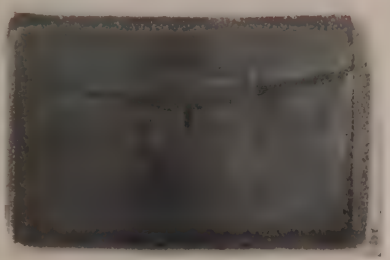

Arnold in Command at West Point

With the British in possession of the Hudson, their line of communication between New York and Canada would have been open and New England would have been cut off from the rest of the country, death by decapitation. To prevent this, the Americans had strongly fortified the Highlands through which the river winds its narrow way and there had gathered large supplies. The works were considered impregnable to a force of twenty thousand men. The most important of these posts was West Point. In the summer of 1780, Arnold, with a purpose that was deliberately treasonable, sought and obtained from Washington the command of West Point and its dependencies from Fishkill to Kings Ferry. In the first week of August, he took up his headquarters on the east bank of the river, at the confiscated house of Beverly Robinson, a Tory colonel. When Washington, accompanied by Lafayette, Hamilton, and others, arrived at Kings Ferry on his way from his headquarters at Tappan to meet Rochambeau at Hartford, Arnold was there with his barge to carry them across the river to Peekskill. The "Vulture," British sloop-of-war, lay at anchor within sight down the river. 1780

Arnold and André Meet

Clandestine letters were passed without difficulty, but there was a pending bargain, and a personal interview was desirable. At midnight of the twenty-first of September, Arnold and André met on the western shore of the Hudson, below Haverstraw. The negotiations had not been concluded at dawn of the twenty-second and André reluctantly consented to ride to Joshua Hett Smith's house, a few miles further up the river. Clinton had instructed André not to go 1780 within the American lines, not to lay off his uniform, and not to take any papers. But Smith's house was within the American lines. André had quitted the protection of the British flag and put his life in the keeping of his accomplice.

Major André's Pocket-book

Arnold's Pass to Major André

A Tedious Day for André

Arnold and André reached Smith's house at daybreak, just in time to hear the booming of the guns and to see the "Vulture" (from which André had come for the meeting) hoist her anchor and drop down the stream. In an upper room of Smith's house, the details of the conspiracy were agreed upon. About ten o'clock, Arnold returned to his headquarters, leaving for André a horse, a pass, and several other documents, most of them in his own handwriting. André took the papers and put them under his foot, but inside his stocking—a second violation of Clinton's orders. At dusk, André and Smith and a negro servant set out by land and crossed the Hudson at Kings Ferry. André had exchanged his military coat for one of Smith's, a third and fatal violation of Sir Henry Clinton's orders. Soon they were hailed by a sentry, but, upon examination, Arnold's permit for "John Anderson to pass the guards to White Plains or below" was held to be all right. As they were informed that there were "cowboys" in the vicinity, the three wayfarers concluded to rest and refresh themselves and found accommodations at a near-by house. Before daylight of the twenty-third, they again set out. When near the Croton River, Smith told André that they were now in neutral territory, quite 1780

Medal awarded by Congress to Williams, Paulding, and Van Wart, for the Capture of André

Map to Illustrate Arnold's Treason and André's Capture

1780 beyond the American lines and danger. He then turned back and reported to Arnold at his headquarters. To this day, there are doubts as to whether Smith was knave or dupe.

André's Arrest

After Smith's departure, André went on alone and with a light heart. Hoping to fall in with the "cowboys" that he heard were on the Tarrytown road, he turned from the direct way to White Plains and took the road that led toward the east bank of the Hudson. But this neutral zone between the Croton and the Spuyten Duyvil had its "skinners" or American prowlers, as well as its "cowboys" or Tory marauders. About nine o'clock, three of a band of "skinners," John Paulding, David Williams, and Isaac Van Wart, were playing cards behind the fence on the west side of the old Albany post-road where it crosses the creek that flows out of Sleepy Hollow. As André approached the little bridge, he was halted by the trio and searched. When his boot was taken off and the treasonable documents were found, Paulding exclaimed, "My God! he is a spy." In spite of his offers of bribes, André was conducted to North Castle and surrendered to Lieutenant-colonel Jameson who commanded there. Each of the captors received the thanks of congress, an annual pension of two hundred dollars, and a silver medal.

André's Execution

Jameson guilelessly sent the prisoner to the co-conspirator with a letter saying that the captured documents had been sent to Washington who was then on his way back from Connecticut. In the evening, Major Benjamin Tallmadge returned to camp and immediately recognized the monumental blunder of his superior officer. The prisoner was recalled, but the letter was delivered to Arnold who, without loss of time, escaped to the "Vulture." André was tried by court martial and sentenced to be hung as a spy; the finding of the September 30 court was approved by the commander-in-chief. Washington could see no way to spare André other than to exchange him for Arnold, but Clinton's honor was at stake and the exchange could not be made. The

IN CONGRESS.

The DELEGATES of the UNITED STATES of New-Hampſhire, Maſſachuſetts-Bay, Rhode-Iſland, Connecticut, New-York, New-Jerſey, Pennſylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North-Carolina, South-Carolina and Georgia, TO Benjamin Tallmadge Esqr

WE, repoſing eſpecial Truſt and Confidence in your Patriotiſm, Valour, Conduct and Fidelity, DO, by theſe Preſents, conſtitute and appoint you to be a Captain in the Regiment of Light Dragoons commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Sheldon in the Army of the United States, raiſed for the Defence of American Liberty, and for repelling every hoſtile Invaſion thereof. You are therefore carefully and diligently to diſcharge the Duty of Captain by doing and performing all manner of Things thereunto belonging. And we do ſtrictly charge and require all Officers and Soldiers under your Command, to be obedient to your Orders as Captain.

And you are to obſerve and follow ſuch Orders and Directions from Time to Time, as you ſhall receive from this or a future Congreſs of the United States, or Committee of Congreſs, for that purpoſe appointed, or Commander in Chief, for the Time being, of the Army of the United States, or any other your ſuperior Officer, according to the Rules and Dicipline of War, in Purſuance of the Truſt repoſed in you. This Commiſſion to continue in Force until revoked by this or a future Congreſs. DATED at Philadelphia the fourteenth of December AD. 1776. Seventy six. By Order of the CONGRESS, Attest. Chas Thomson Secry. John Hancock PRESIDENT.

COMMISSION OF BENJAMIN TALLMADGE

(Signed by John Hancock, December 14, 1776. From original in collection of the Society of the

PORTRAITS OF THE TALLMADGE FAMILY

(Painted by Ralph Earle, 1790. Reproduced by courteous permission of the present owner, Mrs. Mary F. Seymour)

FLAG OF TALLMADGE'S DRAGOONS

(From original in possession of Mrs. J. H. Knox, Troy, New York, by courteous permission) prisoner's youth and many admirable qualities made his fate especially sad, but the public welfare demanded the sacrifice. André displayed great fortitude at the execution which took place on the second of October on the hill near Tappan village. In Westminster Abbey is a mural monument "sacred to the memory of Major John André" and erected by order of "His gracious sovereign, King George III." In 1821, André's remains were removed thither. A plain monument now marks the spot where they first were buried. In 1749, the British parliament had enacted "that all spies, and persons whatsoever who shall come, or be found in the nature of spies, to bring any seducing letter or message from any enemy or rebel, or endeavor to corrupt any captain, officer or mariner . . . to betray his trust, on being convicted by a court-martial shall suffer death." And there was the memory of Nathan Hale. 1780

From an engraving in Political Magazine, March, 1781

Arnold in England

Arnold made good his escape and, though he came empty-handed, he received the promised reward, money and a brigadier-general's commission. He subsequently served against his countrymen in Virginia and Connecticut as will be mentioned in a later chapter. In December, 1781, he sailed for England where he was well received; the odium with which he was treated has been much exaggerated. A pension of five hundred pounds a year was granted to his wife and one of one hundred pounds to each of her children.

1780 Some of his sons rose to high rank in the British service and one died a lieutenant-general. Still, his later life was bitter. In comparative poverty, he died in London, in 1801. During these years, his wife remained devoted to him and he repaid her with an undivided affection. He rarely referred to his treason, but tradition says that when death drew near he called for his American uniform and the epaulets and sword-knot that Washington had given to him. "Let me die in my old American uniform, the uniform in which I fought my battles. May God forgive me for ever putting on any other!"

André's own Sketch of Himself

With Clearer Vision

Mrs. Benedict Arnold

For generations, the hatred of "the traitor Arnold" rendered it impossible for Americans to do justice to Arnold, the superb soldier. At Saratoga stands a tall obelisk with four arched niches in its sides. In one niche is the bronze effigy of Gates; in another, that of Schuyler; in the third, that of Morgan; the fourth is vacant—an emptiness that speaks eloquently of one who, but for one false step into which he was driven by hatred and injustice and his own moral weakness, would be regarded today as the greatest of the four.

BY

Brigadier-General ARNOLD,

A PROCLAMATION.

To the Officers and Soldiers of the Continental Army who have the real Interest of their Country at Heart, and who are determined to be no longer the Tools and Dupes of Congress, or of France.

HAVING reason to believe that the principles I have avowed, in my address to the public of the 7th instant, and invited the greatest part of this continent, I rejoice in the opportunity I have of inviting you to join His Majesty's arms.

His Excellency Sir Henry Clinton has authorized me to raise a corps of cavalry and infantry, who are to be clothed, subsisted, and paid as the other troops are in the British service, and those who bring in horses, arms, or accoutrements, are to be paid their value, or have them to sell them. To every non-commissioned officer and private a bounty of THREE GUINEAS will be given, and as the Commander in Chief is pleased to allow me to nominate the officers, I shall with infinite satisfaction embrace this opportunity of advancing men whose valour I have witnessed, and whose principles are favourable to an union with Britain, and TRUE AMERICAN LIBERTY.

The rank they obtain in the King's service will bear a proportion to their former rank, and the number of men they bring with them.

It is expected that a Lieutenant-Colonel of cavalry will bring with him, or recruit in a reasonable time, 75 men.

Major of HORSE - 50 men.	Lieut. Col. of INFANTRY - 75 men.
Captain of ditto - - - 30	Major of ditto - - - - - - - - - - 50
Lieutenant of ditto - 15	Captain of ditto - - - - - - - - - 30
Cornet of ditto - - - 12	Lieutenant of ditto - - - - - - - - 15
Serjeant of ditto - - - 6	Ensign of ditto - - - - - - - - - - 12
	Serjeant of ditto - - - - - - - - - 6

N. B. Each Field Officer will have a Company.

Great as this encouragement must appear to such as have suffered every distress of want of pay, hunger and nakedness, from the neglect, contempt, and corruption of Congress, they are nothing to the motives which I expect will influence the brave and generous minds I hope to have the honour to command.

in taking the field); and with them to share in the glory of rescuing our native country from the grasp of a hand of France, as well as from the ambitious and interested views of a desperate party among ourselves. Who, in listening to French overtures, and rejecting those from Great-Britain, have brought the colonies to the very brink of destruction.

Friends, fellow soldiers, and citizens, arouse, and judge for yourselves.—reflect on what you have lost,—consider to what you are reduced, and by your courage repel the ruin that still threatens you.

Your country once was happy, and had the proffered peace been embraced, your last two years of misery had been spent in peace and plenty, and repairing the desolations of a quarrel that would have left the interest of Great-Britain and America in its true light, and cemented their friendship, whereas, you are now the prey of avarice, the scorn of your enemies, and the pity of your friends.

You were promised LIBERTY by the leaders of your affairs; but is there an individual in the enjoyment of it, saving your oppressors? Who among you dare speak or write what he thinks, against the tyranny which has robbed you of your property, imprisons your persons, drags you to the field of battle, and is daily deluging your country with your blood?

You are flattered with independency as preferable to a redress of grievances, and for that shadow, instead of real felicity, are sunk into all the wretchedness of poverty by the rapacity of your own rulers. Already are you disqualified to support the pride of character they taught you to aim at, and must inevitably shortly belong to one or other of the great powers their folly and wickedness have drawn into conflict. Happy for you that you may still become the fellow-subjects of Great-Britain, if you nobly disdain to be the vassals of France.

What is America now but a land of widows, orphans, and beggars?—and should the parent nation cease her exertions to deliver you, what security remains to you even for the enjoyment of the consolations of that religion for which your fathers braved the ocean, the heathen, and the wilderness? Do you know that the eye which guides this pen lately saw your mean and profligate Congress at mass for the soul of a Roman Catholic in Purgatory, and participating in the rites of a Church, against whose antichristian corruptions your pious ancestors would have witnessed with their blood?

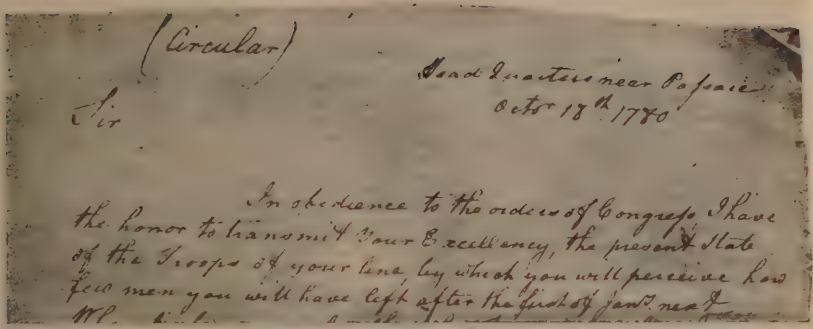

As to you who have been soldiers in the continental army, can you at this day want evidence that the funds of your country are exhausted, or that the managers have applied them to their own private uses? In either case you surely can no longer continue in their service with honour or advantage; yet you have hitherto been their supporters of that cruelty, which, with an equal indifference to yours as well as to the labour and blood of others, is devouring a country, which, from the moment you quit their colours, will be rescued from their tyranny.

But what need of arguments to such as feel infinitely more misery than tongue can express. I therefore only add my promise of the most affectionate welcome and attention to all who are disposed to join me in the measures necessary to close the scene of our afflictions, which, intolerable as they are, must continue to increase until we have the wisdom (shewn of late by Ireland) in being contented with the liberality of the Parliament, who still offers her protection, with the immediate restoration of our ancient privileges, civil and commercial, from all taxes, but such as we shall think fit to impose on ourselves.

B. ARNOLD.

ARNOLD'S PROCLAMATION AFTER HIS TREASON

(From the original broadside in the Library of Congress, Division of Manuscripts)

(Circular)

Head Quarters near Passaic
Octr 18th 1780

Sir

In obedience to the orders of Congress I have the honor to transmit Your Excellency, the present State of the Troops of your line by which you will perceive how few men you will have left after the first of Jany next

When I inform you also that the Troops of the other lines will be in general as much reduced as yours, you will be able to judge how exceedingly weak the army will be at that period, and how essential it is the States should make the most vigorous exertions to replace the discharged men as early as possible.

Congress are now preparing a plan for a new establishment of their army which when finished they will transmit to the several States with requisitions for their respective quotas. I have no doubt it will be a primary object with them to have the Levies for the War; and this appears to me a point so interesting to our independence, that I cannot forbear entering into the motives which ought to determine the States without hesitation or alternative to take their measures decisively for that object.

I am religiously persuaded that the duration of the War, and the greatest part of the misfortunes and perplexities we have hitherto experienced, are chiefly to be attributed to the system of temporary enlistments. Had we in the commencement raised an army for the War, such as was within the reach of the abilities of these States to raise and maintain we should not have suffered those military checks which have so frequently shaken our cause, nor should we have incurred such enormous expenditures as have destroyed our paper currency and with it all public credit. A moderate compact force or a permanent establishment capable of acquiring the discipline essential to military operations would have been able to make head against the enemy without comparison better than the throngs of militia, which at certain periods have been, not in the field, but in their way to and from the field; for from that want of perseverance which characterises all militia, and of that coercion which cannot be exercised upon them, it has always been found impracticable to detain the greatest part of them in service even for the term, for which they have been called out, and this has been commonly so short, that we have had a great proportion of the time two sets of Men to feed and pay, one coming to the army and the other going from it. - From this circumstance and from the extraordinary waste and consumption of provisions stores camp equipage arms cloaths and every other article incident to irregular Troops, it is easy to conceive what an immense increase of public expence has been produced from the source of which I am speaking. I might add the diminution of our agriculture by calling off at critical seasons, the labourers employed in it, as has happened in instances without number.

In the enumeration of articles wasted, I mention Cloathes. It may be objected that the terms of engagement of the Levies do not include this, but if we want service from the men particularly in the cold season we are obliged to supply them notwithstanding, and they leave us before the Cloathes are half worn out.

But there are evils still more striking that have befallen us. The intervals between the dismission of one army and the collection of another have more than once threatned us with ruin, which humanly speaking nothing but the supineness or folly of the Enemy could have saved us from. How did our cause totter at the close of 76, when with a little more than two thousand men we were driven before the enemy thro' Jersey and obliged to take post on the other side of the Delaware to make a shew of covering Philadelphia while in reality nothing was more easy to them with a little enterprise and industry than to make their passage good to that city and dissipate the remaining force which still kept alive our expiring opposition! What hindered them from dispersing our little army and giving a fatal blow to our affairs during all the subsequent winter, instead of remaining in a state of torpid inactivity and permitting us to hover about their quarters, when we had scarcely Troops sufficient to mount the ordinary guards? After having lost two battles and Philadelphia in the following campaign for want of those numbers and that degree of discipline, which we might have acquired by a permanent force in the first instance, in what a cruel and perilous situation did we again find ourselves in the Winter of 77 at the Valley Forge within a days march of the Enemy, with little more than a third of their strength, unable to defend our position, or retreat from it for want of the means of transportation? What but the fluctuation of our army enabled the enemy to detach so boldly to the Southward in 78 & 79 to take possession of two States, Georgia, & South Carolina, while we were obliged here to be idle spectators of their weakness, set at defiance by a Garrison of Six thousand regular Troops, accessible every where by a Bridge which nature had formed, but of which we were unable to take advantage from still greater weakness, apprehensive even for our own safety? How did the same Garrison insult the main army of these States the ensuing Spring and threaten the destruction of all our baggage and stores,— saved by a good countenance more than by an ability to defend them? — And what will be our situation this Winter, our army by the first of January diminished to little more than a sufficient Garrison for West Point, the Enemy at full liberty to ravage the Country wherever they please, and leaving a handful of men at New York to undertake expeditions for the reduction of other States which for want of adequate means of defence, will, it is much to be dreaded, add to the number of their conquests & to the examples of our want of energy and wisdom?

The loss of Canada to the union, & the fate of the brave Montgomery, compelled to a rash attempt by the immediate prospect of being left without Troops, might be enumerated in the catalogue of evils that have sprang from this fruitful source.

We not only incur these dangers & suffer these losses, for want of a constant force equal to our exigencies, but while we labour under this impediment, it is impossible there can ever be any order or economy, or system in our finances. If we meet with any severe blow, the great exertions which the moment requires to stop the progress of the misfortune oblige us to depart from general principles to run into any expence, or to adopt any expedient however injurious, on a large scale to procure the force & means which the present exigency demands. Every thing is thrown into confusion, & the measures taken to remedy immediate evils perpetuate others. The same is the case if particular conjunctures invite us to offensive operations, — we find ourselves unprepared, without Troops, without magazines, & with little time to provide them. We are obliged to force our resources by the most burthensome methods to answer the end and after all it is but half answered. The design is announced by the occasional effort and the Enemy have it in their power to counteract or elude the blow. The prices of every thing, men provisions &cc are raised to a height to which the revenues of no government much less ours would suffice. It is impossible that people can endure the excessive burthen of Bounties for annual Drafts and substitutes increasing at every new experiment: — Whatever it might cost them once for all to procure men for the War would be a cheap bargain.

I am convinced our system of temporary enlistments has prolonged the War, and encouraged the Enemy to persevere. Baffled while we had an army in the field, they have been constantly looking forward to the period of its reduction, as the period to our opposition & the season of their successes — They have flattered themselves with more than the event has justified, for they believed when one army expired we should not be able to raise another; undeceived however in this expectation by experience, they still remain convinced — & to me evidently on good grounds, that we must ultimately sink under a system, which increases our expence beyond calculation, enfeebles all our measures, affords the most inviting opportunities to the Enemy, & wearies & disgusts the People: This has doubtless had great influence in preventing their coming to terms, & will continue to operate in the same way. The debates on the ministerial side have frequently manifested the operation of this motive, & it must in the nature of things have had great weight.

The interposition of neutral powers may lead to a negotiation this Winter. Nothing will tend so much to make the Court of London reasonable as the prospect of a permanent army in this Country, & a spirit of exertion to support it.

It is time we should get rid of an error which the experience of all mankind has exploded, and which our own experience has dearly taught us to reject; — The carrying on a War with militia or (which is nearly the same thing) temporary Levies, against a regular, permanent & disciplined force. The idea is chimerical, & that we have so long persisted in it, is a reflection on the judgment of a nation so enlightened as we are, as well as a strong proof of the Empire of prejudice over reason. If we continue in the infatuation we shall deserve to lose the object we are contending for.

America has been almost amused out of her liberties — we have frequently heard the behavior of the militia extolled upon one & another occasion — by men who jud[g]e only from the surface, by men who had particular views in misrepresenting — by visionary men whose credulity easily swallows every vague story, in support of a favorite hypothesis.— I solemnly declare I never was witness to a single instance that can countenance an opinion of militia or raw Troops being fit for the real business of fighting. I have found ills the critical condition of the army and urges abandonment of short-term enlistments.

Letter from George Washington to Nathanael Greene

in the office of the Rhode Island Secretary of State, Providence, Rhode Island) l as light parties to skirmish in the woods but incapable of making or sustaining a serious attack.

ess is only acquired by habits of discipline & service. I mean not to detract from the merit of — their zeal & spirit upon a variety of occasions, have entitled them to the highest applause, the greatest importance we should learn to estimate them rightly. We may expect every thing that militia is capable of; but we must not expect from any, services for which regulars alone ate Battle of Campden is a melancholy comment upon this doctrine — The militia fled at the d left the Continental Troops surrounded on every side and overpowered by numbers to com-ety instead of victory. The Enemy themselves, have witnessed to their valor.

effect of short enlistments, which I have not yet taken notice of, is that the constant fluctuation n is one of the sources of disgust to the Officers. Just when, by great trouble, fatigue and vexawhich the training of Recruits is attended) they have brought their men to some kind of order -- he mortification to see them go home, and to know that the drudgery is to recommence the next In Regiments so constituted an officer has neither satisfaction nor credit in his command.
motive which can arise from a consideration of our circumstances, either in a domestick or nt of view, calls upon us to abandon temporary expedients and substitute something durable & substantial. This applies as well to our civil administration as to our military establishment.
essary to give Congress the common head, sufficient powers to direct the common forces as it is army for the War; but I should go out of my province to expatiate on Civil affairs — I cannot ding a few more remarks.
nances are in an alarming state of derangement. Public credit is almost arrived at its last stage ople begin to be dissatisfied with the feeble mode of conducting the War, and with the ineffectual posed upon them — which though light in comparison with what other nations feel, are from ty heavy to them.— They lose their confidence in Government apace. The army is not only into nothing, but the discontents of the Officers as well as the men, have matured to a degree ens but too general a renunciation of the service at the end of the campaign. Since Jan^{y}. last we registered at Head Quarters, more than one hundred & sixty resignations, besides a number of never were regularly reported. I speak of the Army in this quarter.— We have frequently in of the Campaign experienced an extremity of want.— Our Officers are indecently defective in — our men are almost naked, totally unprepared for the inclemency of the approaching season.
no magazines for the Winter — The mode of procuring our supplies is precarious, and all the the officers employed in collecting them are gloomy. circumstances conspire to shew the necessity of immediately adopting a plan that will give more Government,— more vigor and more satisfaction to the Army. Without it we have every thing am persuaded of the sufficiency of our resources if properly directed.
l the requisitions of Congress by any accident not arrive, before the Legislature is about to rise, commend that a plan be devised which is likely to be effectual, for raising the men that will be r the War, leaving it to the executive to apply it to the quota which Congress will fix. I flatter ever the requisitions will arrive in time.
resent crisis of our affairs appears to me so serious as to call upon me as a good citizen, to give my freely for the safety of the Republic — I hope the motive will excuse the liberty I have taken.

I have the honor to be
With the highest respect & esteem
Your Excellency's
Most Obed^{t} Hum^{a} Servant
Go. Washington

Excellency Governor Greene

ed from the original

1780 After the Play

General Greene assumed the command at West Point and Washington took post with his main army at Prakeness near Passaic Falls in New Jersey, whence, on the eighteenth of October, he issued a circular to the states describing the critical condition of the army "and how essential it is the States should make the most vigorous exertions to replace" as early as possible the men who would be discharged by the end of the year.

CHAPTER XI

ON THE SEA

Privateers

ENGLAND was easily the mistress of the sea. America had neither navy nor resources that would enable her to create a navy that could meet on equal terms that of England, but she had thousands of hardy seamen who gladly turned from commerce and the fisheries for the capture of English merchantmen and transports. Not all who were engaged in privateering were actuated primarily by patriotic motives. Credit must be given to them for distressing the enemy and for capturing supplies that were needed, but if congress got the goods it had to pay for them. It probably would be fair to say that the typical privateersman was a patriot engaged in business ventures; "New England, the home of the privateers, was never more prosperous than in the last years of the Revolution."

The Keel of the American Navy

The war had not been long in progress before congress took steps to create a regular navy as related in the preceding volume, and provided for the commissioning of privateers. Before the end of the war, almost every one of the thirteen war-ships ordered in December, 1775, had been captured or burned to avoid capture and others were bought or built to take their places. Not including the vessels employed by Washington in the siege of Boston or Arnold's fleet on Lake Champlain, the American navy of the Revolution consisted of fifty-six armed vessels, with an average of twenty guns each. The largest number employed at any one time was twenty-seven in the fall of 1776. 1775 1783

The want of efficient armament, naval stores, and provisions was serious, but the chief obstacle to the success of the little continental navy was the lack of sailors. The proportion of seafaring population was far greater than it is now, but patriotism was not universal, the pay was small, and above all else, there were "the seductive allurements of privateering." Vessels that ought to have been manned with full crews of able seamen frequently went to sea with weak crews composed of deserters, foreigners, and a few Americans. The frigate "Alliance," while on her way to France with Lafayette, carried seventy or eighty British sailors who planned to seize and carry her into a British port and, when the "Bon Homme Richard" fought the "Serapis," she was a veritable Babel of tongues. The Men Behind the Guns

At the end of 1775, a squadron of eight small cruisers was gathered at Philadelphia. Late in December or early in January, Esek Hopkins, the commander-in-chief of the navy, went on board his flag-ship, the "Alfred," and, at a signal from Captain Dudley Saltonstall, Lieutenant John Paul Jones hoisted the first flag that ever floated over a regularly commissioned American man-of-war. Early in March, Hopkins captured Nassau in the Bahamas, took more than a hundred cannons and a large quantity of military stores, and carried off the governor. On his way homeward, he took two small prizes, but, after a severe fight with the twenty-gun ship "Glasgow," allowed her to escape from his fleet. For this failure and other causes, Hopkins fell into disgrace, was suspended from his command, and was ultimately dismissed from the service. For the remainder of the war, the American navy was without a commander-in-chief. The Cruise of "Commodore" Hopkins

May 1, 1777
January 2, 1778

With the exception of New Jersey and Delaware, each of the thirteen states owned one or more armed vessels. Most of these vessels were small craft suited for defending shallow rivers, bays, and harbors; though none of them performed any great exploit, they rendered impor- State Navies 1777 tant service. Connecticut had a submarine vessel, a tortoise-shaped boat that could be propelled under water and contained enough air to allow the operator to remain submerged about half an hour. In 1777, the submarine was sent against a British war-ship in New York harbor. The "American Turtle" got under the British vessel, but the operator was unable properly to attach his magazine of powder and the attempt failed.

Captain Wickes in European Waters

The first continental cruiser to appear in European waters was the "Reprisal," sixteen guns, Captain Lambert Wickes. In the fall of 1776, she was sent to carry Franklin to France; on the way, Wickes captured two prizes which he brought into port. The "Reprisal" then cruised in the Bay of Biscay and captured two more prizes, one being the king's packet plying between Falmouth and Lisbon. When these prizes were brought into Nantes, the British agents remonstrated so vehemently that the vessels were taken into the offing and secretly sold to French merchants; France was still under strict treaty obligation to England. In April, 1777, the "Reprisal" was joined by the "Lexington." Then the "Dolphin," a cutter of ten guns, was purchased and fitted out by the American agents. In June, 1777, Wickes cruised with these vessels in the Bay of Biscay and made two circuits of Ireland, capturing or destroying seventeen or eighteen vessels. These operations deterred English merchants from shipping goods in English bottoms; in a few weeks, forty French ships were loading in the Thames, a thing never before known. England protested so vigorously that the French government seized the "Reprisal" and the "Lexington" and held them until security was given that they would leave France which they did in September. The "Lexington" was captured by a British cruiser and the "Reprisal" foundered off Newfoundland.

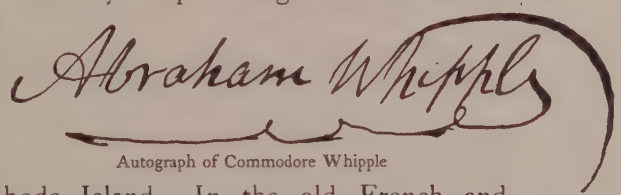

Captain Conyngham

Meanwhile, the American agents had bought a lugger at Dover and brought her over to Dunkirk where she was equipped, named the "Surprise," and put in charge of Captain Gustavus Conyngham. With a nondescript crew, Conyngham sailed from Dunkirk early in May, 1777, and soon returned with two prizes. Under pressure from the English ambassador, France gave up the prizes and seized the "Surprise" and her crew. "With some address and intrigue" on the part of Deane and his associates, Conyngham and his men were soon released; in July, they sailed in another cutter called the "Revenge." Their "trading voyage" led them directly toward the British coast and, for several months, the "Revenge" was a terror to English shipping. When English vessels were no longer safe in the English Channel, Englishmen were almost prepared for the abduction of London Tower. On one occasion, Conyngham in disguise sailed into an English port, secured the supplies he wanted, and escaped in safety. He sailed for America and was captured in the following year. The protests of congress saved his neck and he finally broke prison and escaped. 1776 1778

French Complicity

These exploits, comparable to those of the Confederate cruiser "Alabama" in 1862–64, were rendered possible by the neglect of France to enforce the neutrality laws. Although that government occasionally remonstrated and made a show of heeding British protests, the American agents suffered little serious opposition. Vessels were bought and armed, crews were enlisted, officers were provided with commissions brought over in blank from America for the purpose, and prizes found a ready market. The remembrance of what she suffered at this time may have led England to excuse herself for her arbitrary conduct in the years preceding the war of 1812.

Autograph of Commodore Whipple

Abraham Whipple

Among the many enterprising Revolutionary seamen, was Abraham Whipple of Rhode Island. In the old French and Indian war he had commanded a privateer and captured twenty-three French vessels in a single cruise; in 1772, 1775 1778 he took and burned the "Gaspee" in Narragansett Bay; and, in 1775, he was made commodore of the Rhode Island navy. In the summer of 1779, in command of the light frigate "Providence," he fell in with a large convoy of merchantmen on their way from Jamaica to England. Whipple concealed the character of his ship, boldly entered the fleet as one of their number, and, in the night of each of ten successive days, boarded and captured one of the convoy. Eight of the prizes thus taken arrived safely at Boston where they were sold for more than a million dollars.

John Paul Jones

In the December following Conyngham's departure for America, John Paul Jones arrived in Nantes with the "Ranger," eighteen guns. The son of a master gardener named John Paul, he was born in 1747 on the estate of Arbigland in southwestern Scotland. At the age of twelve, he was apprenticed to a merchant at Whitehaven and made a voyage to Virginia where his elder brother was established as a planter. He subsequently made several voyages to the West Indies and, when his brother died in 1773, took charge of his Virginia estate and, for some reason, added "Jones" to his name. In 1775, as already related, he was appointed senior first lieutenant in the American navy. He accompanied Hopkins on his cruise to the Bahamas and, in May, 1776, was given command of the sloop "Providence" with which he captured sixteen prizes. Later in the same year, with the

Birthplace of John Paul Jones

IN CONGRESS.

1777
1778

The DELEGATES of the UNITED STATES of New Hampshire, Massachusetts-Bay, Rhode-Island, Connecticut, New-York, New-Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North-Carolina, South-Carolina, and Georgia, TO

John Paul Jones Esqr.

WE, reposing especial Trust and Confidence in your Patriotism, Valour, Conduct, and Fidelity, DO, by these Presents, constitute and appoint you to be Captain of the ~~Armed~~ ~~called the~~ in the Navy of the United States of North-America, fitted out for the Defence of American Liberty, and for repelling every hostile Invasion thereof. You are therefore carefully and diligently to discharge the Duty of Captain by doing and performing all manner of Things thereunto belonging. And we do strictly charge and require all Officers, Marines and Seamen under your Command, to be obedient to your Orders as Captain And you are to observe and follow such Orders and Directions from Time to Time as you shall receive from this or a future Congress of the United States, or Committee of Congress for that Purpose appointed, or Commander in Chief for the Time being of the Navy of the United States, or any other your superior Officer, according to the Rules and Discipline of War, the Usage of the Sea, and the Instructions herewith given you, in Pursuance of the Trust reposed in you. This Commission to continue in Force until revoked by this or a future Congress.

DATED at Philadelphia October 10th 1776.

By Order of the CONGRESS,

ATTEST Chas Thomson jun'y John Hancock PRESIDENT.

Facsimile of Jones's Commission as Captain

"Providence" and the "Alfred," he took many prizes including the ship "Mellish" laden with stores for Carleton's army. In June, 1777, being then a captain, he was given command of the "Ranger" and hoisted over her the first "Stars and Stripes" ever raised over an American warship. After his arrival in France, he obtained from a French admiral the first salute ever given to that flag by the representative of a foreign power; the ink had hardly had

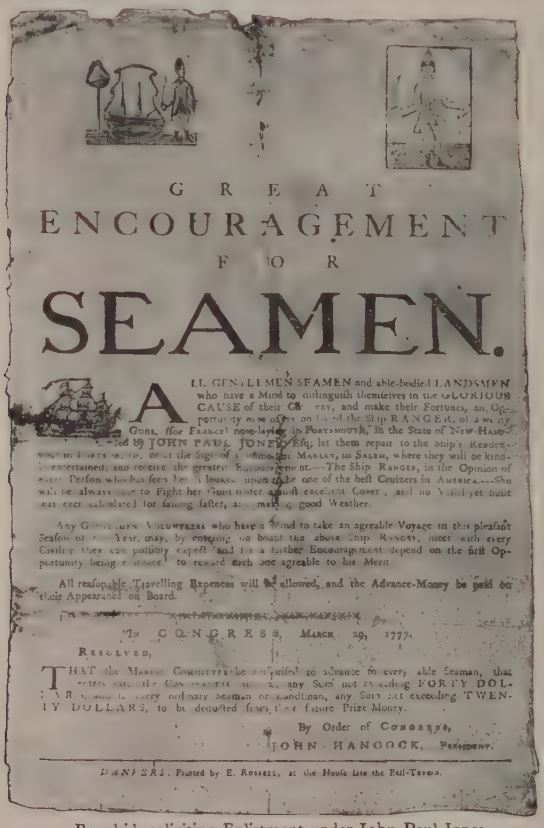

The "Stars and Stripes" of the "Bon Homme Richard"

February 14, 1778

1778 time to dry on the Franco-American treaties of commerce
1779 and alliance.

Warming Up

On the tenth of April, 1778, Jones sailed from Brest for a cruise in familiar waters. He took numerous prizes and made a night entrance into the harbor of Whitehaven. On the following night, he tried to abduct the earl of Selkirk from his country seat on the River Dee, but found that his lordship was not at home. On the evening of the twenty-fourth, he captured the sloop-of-war "Drake," twenty guns, and, with her, two other prizes, and many prisoners, arrived safely at Brest. By this time, Jones felt that he ought to have a squadron that would enable him to inflict serious injury upon the enemy.

GREAT ENCOURAGEMENT FOR SEAMEN.

ALL GENTLEMEN SEAMEN and able-bodied LANDSMEN who have a Mind to distinguish themselves in the GLORIOUS CAUSE of their Country, and make their Fortunes, an Opportunity now offers on board the Ship RANGER, of twenty Guns, for FRANCE; now lying in PORTSMOUTH, in the State of NEW-HAMPSHIRE, commanded by JOHN PAUL JONES, Esq; let them repair to the Ship's Rendezvous in PORTSMOUTH, or at the Sign of Captain DALE MARLEY, in SALEM, where they will be kindly entertained, and receive the greatest Encouragement.—The Ship RANGER, in the Opinion of every Person who has seen her, looks upon her to be one of the best Cruizers in AMERICA.—She will be always ready to Fight her Guns under almost every Cover, and no Vessel yet built was ever calculated for sailing faster, or manœuvring good Weather.

Any GENTLEMEN VOLUNTEERS who have a Mind to take an agreeable Voyage in this pleasant Season of the Year, may, by entering on board the above Ship RANGER, meet with every Civility they can possibly expect; and for a further Encouragement depend on the first Opportunity being embraced to reward each one agreeable to his Merit.

All reasonable Travelling Expences will be allowed, and the Advance-Money be paid on their Appearance on Board.

IN CONGRESS, MARCH 29, 1777.

RESOLVED,

THAT the Marine Committee be and is hereby directed to advance to every able Seaman, that enters into the Service aforesaid, any Sum not exceeding FORTY DOLLARS, and to every ordinary Seaman or Landsman, any Sum not exceeding TWENTY DOLLARS, to be deducted from their future Prize-Money.

By Order of CONGRESS,
JOHN HANCOCK, President.

BANGERS. Printed by E. RUSSELL, at the House late the Earl-Tavern.

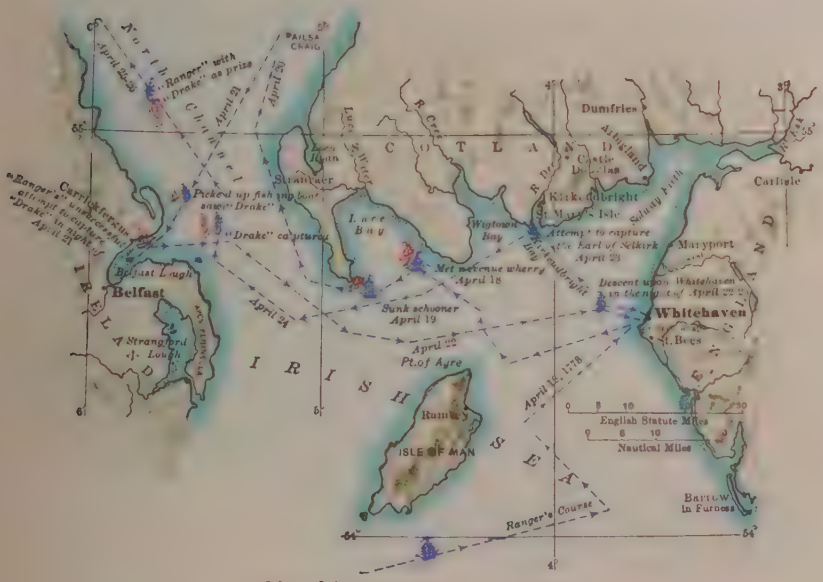

Broadside soliciting Enlistment under John Paul Jones

May 8

Jones Gets a Squadron February 4, 1779

After vexatious delays and tedious negotiations, the French government purchased an old Indiaman and gave the command to Jones. Jones renamed her the "Bon Homme Richard," a compliment to Franklin, and, with almost ruinous haste, transformed her into a two-decked frigate carrying twenty-eight 12-pounders, eight 9-pounders, and six old 18-pounders. The thirty-six gun frigate "Alliance," the "Pallas" of thirty guns, the brig "Vengeance" of twelve guns, and the cutter "Cerf" of eighteen guns were also put under his command. All of their officers carried American commissions, all of the 1779 ships bore the American colors, and, excepting the "Alliance," all were provided at the king's expense. Jones and most of the officers of the "Bon Homme Richard" were Americans, nominally at least; Landais of the "Alliance" and the other captains were French. The crews were made up of all nationalities. The muster-roll of the "Bon Homme Richard" showed that her "men hailed from America, France, Italy, Ireland, Germany, Scotland, Sweden, Switzerland, England, Spain, India, 1779 Norway, Portugal, Fayal, and Malaisia, while there were seven Maltese, and the knight of the ship's galley was from Africa."

Map of the Movements of the "Ranger"

The Cruise of the "Bon Homme Richard"

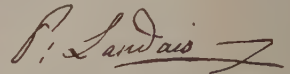

On the fourteenth of August, the squadron put to sea accompanied by two French privateers. The privateers and the "Cerf" soon left the squadron and did not come back. Taking occasional prizes, Jones sailed up the west coast of Ireland and came down the east coast of Scotland to beard the lion in his den. A daring scheme to seize the shipping at Leith, the port of Edinburgh, and to exact a ransom was frustrated by a gale that drove the squadron out of the Firth of Forth. By the middle of September, Jones had captured or destroyed twenty-six vessels and spread terror along the east coast of Scotland and England. On the twenty-third of September, off Flamborough Head, he sighted a fleet of forty British merchantmen under convoy of the "Countess of Scarborough" of twenty-eight guns, and of the "Serapis," rated at forty-four but mounting fifty guns and commanded by Captain Richard Pearson.

September 17

Off Flamborough Head

Jones gave the signal for a chase and Pearson signaled for the ships under convoy to take care of themselves. Most of the merchantmen ran in shore and anchored under cover of the guns of Scarborough castle. Landais, the French captain of the "Alliance," who had been insubordinate throughout the cruise, made little or no effort to obey Jones's signals and called out to Captain Cottineau of the "Pallas" that, if the fleet was convoyed by a vessel of more than fifty guns, they must run away.

Autograph of Peter Landais

(Compiled by Mrs. Annie H. Eastman, assistant to the Librarian in the Naval War Records Library, Washington, D. C., by careful investigation of original sources and material, including parts of the log of the "Bon Homme Richard")

But Cottineau obeyed Jones's orders and the "Pallas" engaged the "Countess of Scarborough." The issue of their action was far more satisfactory than any account of the conflict that has come down to us. 1779

Sir Richard Pearson

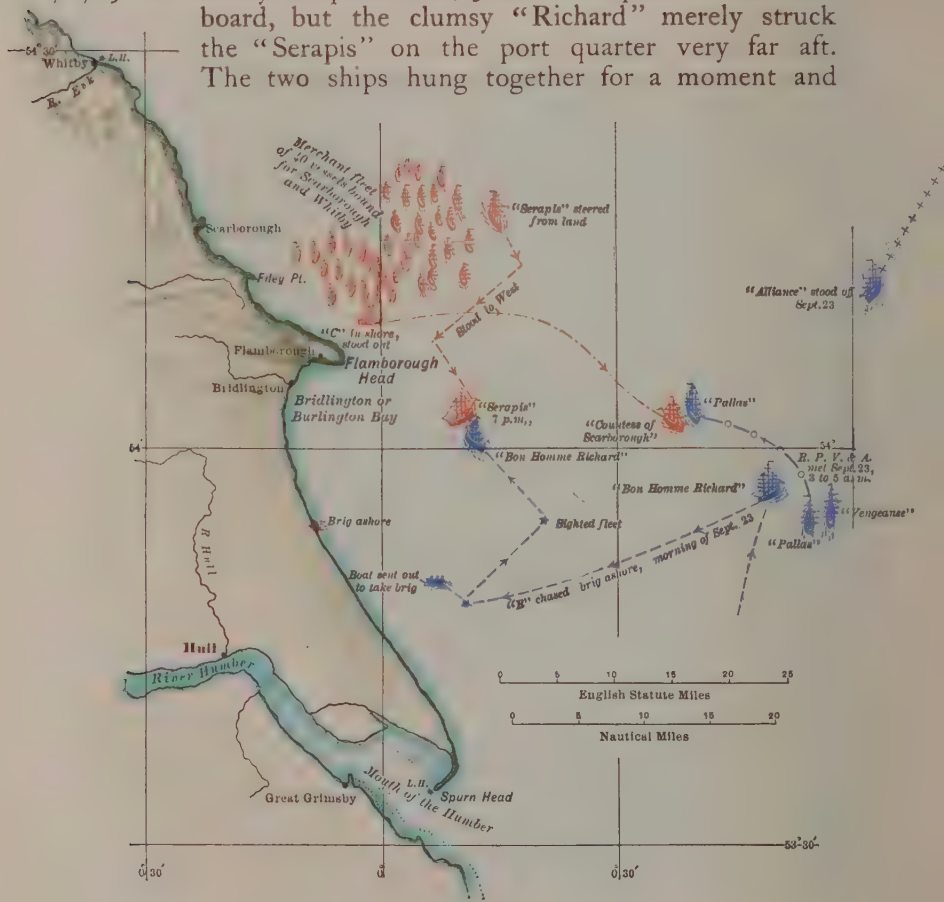

The Contestants

At about half-past seven in the evening, the "Richard" came within pistol shot of the "Serapis." The latter was a staunch new vessel built for war, her guns were trustworthy, and her crew was homogeneous; the "Richard" was a weather-worn merchant ship, some of her guns were old and condemned, and her crew had been gathered from the corners of the earth. But Captain Richard Pearson was not Captain John Paul Jones. The water was smooth; the wind was light; the weather was delightful; and the moon was at its full. Flamborough Head was less than a league away and the piers at Scarborough were crowded with spectators.

The Beginning of the Fight

At the first exchange of broadsides, two of the old 18-pounders on the improvised lower deck of the "Richard" burst, killing and wounding most of the men who managed them. The men at the other guns on that deck soon went to the upper deck and the lower ports were closed. It was not a promising beginning of the duel. Finding that his vessel was being badly cut up by 1779 the enemy's superior fire, Jones attempted to close and board, but the clumsy "Richard" merely struck the "Serapis" on the port quarter very far aft. The two ships hung together for a moment and then separated. Presumably it was then that Captain Pearson hailed the "Richard" and asked if she had struck. "I have not yet begun to fight!" was Jones's celebrated answer.

Position of the Fleets before the Engagement of September 23, 1779

The Fight

The action was at once renewed. The ships again came foul and Jones, with his own hands, quickly lashed the two together. Pearson cast anchor, hoping that the "Richard" would drift away, but the vessels swung together, head and stern, with their sides touching. The ships were so close together that the closed ports midship the "Serapis" could not be opened and the gunners there "fired their first shots through their own port-lids and blew them off." The guns of either ship were fired into the starboard ports or through the sides of the other. Men fought with pikes and pistols 1779 through the open ports, and hand-grenades were dropped from the yards of the "Richard" upon the deck of the "Serapis." The fire of the "Serapis" silenced the main-deck battery of the "Richard," but Jones kept on fighting with his 9-pounders which he helped to serve with his own hands and, with the assistance of musketry in the tops, raked the deck of the enemy fore and aft.

The Engagement, September 23, 1779

Meanwhile, the "Alliance" had been acting in an extraordinary manner. The facts are not entirely clear, Captain Landais 1779 but it seems that twice during the action Landais fired into the two vessels indiscriminately, killing several men on board the "Richard." This behavior made Jones's crew fear that the "Alliance" had been captured and that, manned by British sailors, she was attacking them. By this time, the "Pallas" had captured the "Countess," and Cottineau asked Landais to take charge of his prize and allow him to go to the relief of Jones—a service that the latter declined. Some have thought that 1779

"The memorable Engagement of Captn. Pearson of the SERAPIS, with Paul Jones of the Bon Homme Richard & his Squadron, Sep. 23. 1779."
(Reproduced from a copper-plate engraving, measuring 17½ by 23 inches, engraved by John Boydell in 1780. It was dedicated to "Sir Richard Pearson Knt. whose Bravery & Conduct saved the Baltic Fleet, under his Convoy, tho' obliged to submit to a much superior force.")

Landais wished the "Richard" to be captured in order that he might gain the honor of taking both vessels, but Admiral Mahan is of the opinion that the strange behavior was due to physical or professional timidity. Landais appears to have been partially insane. Upon his return to America, he was dismissed from the service.

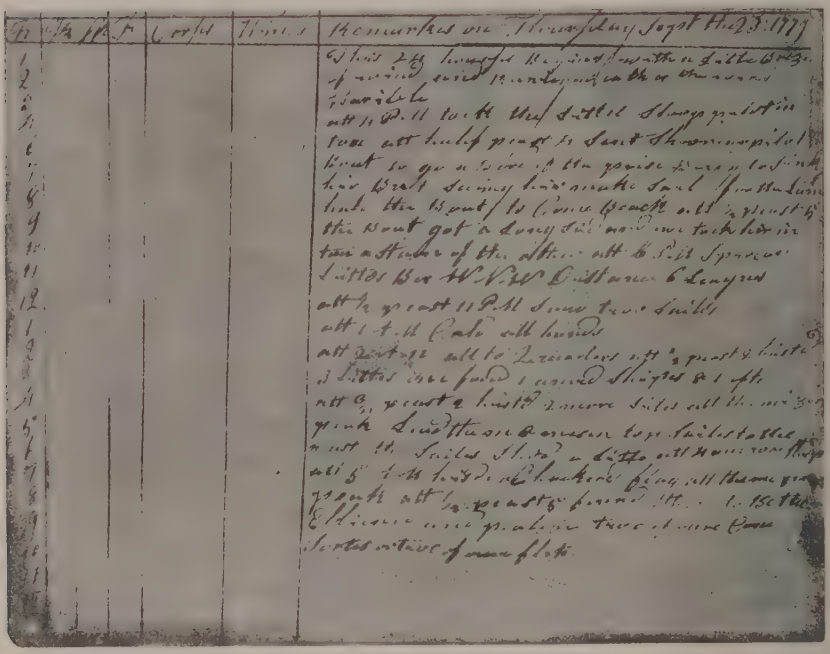

After two hours of desperate fighting, one of the men in the "Richard's" tops worked his way out to the end of the main-yard with a bucket of hand-grenades, lighted them one by one, and coolly dropped them down upon the deck of the enemy. In the middle of the lower deck

The Man with a Grenade

1779 of the "Serapis" a row of 18-pounder cartridges had been piled. One of the grenades, dropped through the main hatchway, fired one of these cartridges and a flash followed the train each way through the ship. The explosion was terrific. More than twenty men were blown to pieces and many more were badly burned and wounded. This demoralized all the crew in that part of the vessel, disabled the main battery, and proved to be the crisis of the action.

A Page from the Log of the "Bon Homme Richard"

The "Serapis" Surrenders

Meanwhile, the situation on the "Richard" was frightful. The ship was on fire, there was six feet of water in the hold, and the cry arose that the vessel was sinking. The master-at-arms, believing that all was lost, released more than a hundred prisoners some of whom scrambled through the ports, gained footing on the "Serapis," and assured Captain Pearson that, if he could keep up the fighting a few minutes more, the "Richard" would be his. But the remaining prisoners were convinced by Lieutenant Richard Dale that both ships were sinking; impelled by fear and threats, they worked at the pumps like madmen instead of making further trouble. According to some accounts, Pearson again asked Jones if he had struck and, when he got no answer, called for boarders. But Jones had no notion of surrender and, when the boarders reached the deck of the "Richard," they found Jones with a pike at the head of his men. The boarding party was driven back and, at half-past ten, Pearson pulled down the flag of the "Serapis" with his own hands. 1779

The End of "Bon Homme Richard"

Brass Candlestick saved from the sinking Wreck of the "Bon Homme Richard" after her Engagement with the "Serapis"

Although both British vessels were captured, the brave resistance they had made enabled the convoy to escape. Captain Pearson was knighted for his gallantry—a circumstance that, tradition says, led Jones to remark: "He deserved it, and if I fall in with him again, I'll make a lord of him." The "Richard" was so badly injured that it was impossible to take her into port. Her crew and the prisoners were transferred to the other vessels and, on the morning of the twenty-fifth, the decayed and riddled hulk went to the bottom. With the prizes and his remaining vessels, Jones arrived at the Texel in safety. The British remonstrated mightily against his presence and Jones turned all the vessels over to France with the exception of the "Alliance" in which he went again to sea in order to relieve the embarrassment of the Dutch government. October 3

Jones's Later Life and Death

On one side of the Channel, it was "the pirate Jones;" on the other side, Jones was a hero. The king of France gave him a gold-mounted sword and asked the consent of congress to decorate him with the Order of Military Merit. Somewhat tardily, congress voted him its thanks and a gold medal. This was, however, Jones's last important service. Later in the war, he was assigned to command the line-of-battle ship "America," but the ship was not finished until the close of hostilities and then was given to France. In 1788, he entered the Russian service as a rear-admiral and fought against the Turks, but, through the intrigues of enemies, he soon fell into disfavor at court and was relieved of his command. He died at Paris in July, 1792. After a long search, his remains were discovered in 1905 and brought to the United States where, with elaborate commemorative exercises, they were reinterred at the naval academy at Annapolis.

1779 1906

April 24, 1906

The Ubiquitous Privateer

Sword presented to Jones by Louis XVI.

The fight between the "Serapis" and the "Richard" was the last important action between British and American ships during the war. Little was left of the American navy and France relieved congress of the "expensive necessity of meeting at sea the greatest naval power in the world." American privateers, however, continued as ubiquitous as ever. In the one month of May, 1779, eighteen prizes were brought into New London and the admiralty courts were kept in busy operation. The total number of vessels and men engaged in privateering can never be known. Edward Everett Hale estimates that more than five hundred privateers were commissioned by the several states and thinks it probable that Great Britain "often had more American enemies afloat on the Atlantic than she had seamen and officers of her own upon that ocean." 1779

Medal awarded to Jones by Congress

CHAPTER XII

EUROPEAN COMPLICATIONS—THE ARMED NEUTRALITY

Florida Blanca

SPAIN entered the war in 1779. The decisive step followed long negotiation and much hesitation. Spain hated England, but she feared the effect of the success of the United States upon her own American possessions, a fear that time has justified. Florida Blanca, the Spanish secretary of state, had characterized the Franco-American treaty of alliance as "worthy of Don Quixote" and proposed an alliance on the terms that Spain should receive Florida, the eastern valley of the Mississippi, the exclusive navigation of that river, and that, at the peace, New York and Rhode Island should be left in British hands, "thus sowing seeds of future strife between England and America."

Vergennes

Vergennes

Vergennes stood firm in a diplomatic loyalty to his pledges to America, but said that France was far from desiring the United States to control the whole continent. He hoped for several confederations in America—not one.

Canada must remain with England and, if Spain could get Florida, America would not be formidable, especially if Spain seized the opportunity to conquer the lands east of the Mississippi. He even went so far as to urge upon congress the desirability of placating Spain by letting her have the western lands, giving warning through Gerard at Philadelphia that France would not prolong the war to procure them for America and declaring that if the French monarch had to choose between a Spanish and an American alliance, he would take the former. 1779

France and Spain in Alliance April 12

Spain's treaty of alliance with France provided for an invasion of England or Ireland. France was to assist Spain in recovering Florida, Minorca, the Bay of Honduras, and the coast of Campeachy. If Newfoundland was conquered, the fisheries were to be monopolized by the conquerors. Neither party was to suspend hostilities or sign a peace until Gibraltar had been recovered for Spain. It has been claimed that this provision released the United States from her obligation not to conclude a separate peace. In the opinion of Mr. Bancroft, the United States "gained the right to make peace whenever Great Britain would recognise their independence." The treaty was far from popular in America and the stipulation regarding the fisheries excited loud indignation, particularly in New England.

Spain was not an American Ally

The treaty did not make Spain an ally of the United States; she never was one. Vergennes continued to present the Spanish views to congress and some of the smaller states were willing to agree to the Appalachians as the western boundary. By 1781, congress was so eager for Spanish assistance that it instructed Jay, its representative at Madrid, to agree to surrender the free navigation of the Mississippi below the thirty-first degree of latitude and later practically admitted a willingness to give up the back country. Luckily nothing came of these overtures; at the close of the war, America obtained more favorable terms than she could have done had Spain been her ally.

A Naval Fiasco

Spain declared war on the sixteenth of June. Gibraltar was at once besieged and, in August, a combined 1779–1781 French and Spanish fleet, numbering sixty-six ships of the line besides frigates and smaller vessels, entered the English Channel. The British were caught unprepared, but dissensions broke out among the allies, the crews suffered greatly from disease, and the attempt proved a failure.

Spain Invades Michigan

In America, French and Spanish arms were more successful. D'Estaing captured Saint Vincent and took Grenada, and Galvez, the energetic governor of Louisiana, overran western Florida. A Spanish force even seized the post of Saint Joseph in Michigan but soon evacuated it. These conquests might have enabled Spain to set up a valid claim to the eastern valley of the Mississippi had it not been for the previous successes of George Rogers Clark.

January, 1781

Admiral Rodney

January, 1780

By this time, the war was being waged in Europe, the United States, the West Indies, and the East Indies. As dangers multiplied, English courage rose and a great naval commander led the English fleets to victory. Sir George Rodney was given command of twenty ships of the line and sent to relieve Gibraltar. He fell in with a Spanish fleet of fifteen merchant vessels convoyed by seven men-of-war and captured them all, defeated a Spanish fleet of eleven ships of the line off Cadiz, threw supplies into Gibraltar, and sailed for the West Indies where he fought some indecisive actions with the French. In August, he divided his fleet and sailed with one division for New York where he arrived on the twelfth of September. 1778–1780

The Right of Search

Meanwhile, affairs in Europe were becoming more complicated. The arrogance of Great Britain in general and the manner in which she exercised the right of search had aroused the hostility of Europe. As early as 1752, a Prussian memorial urged that "free ships make free goods." In 1778, France proclaimed her acceptance of the doctrine and Vergennes suggested to the Empress Catherine of Russia that she should form a league of neutral powers for the protection of neutral trade. England still maintained the right of a belligerent to seize an enemy's goods when carried on a neutral vessel. In this, she was unquestionably within her rights, but in the exercise of the right she made many unwarrantable seizures.

Still Crowding the Dutch

At the end of 1779, a fleet of Dutch vessels escorted by five war-ships under Count Bylandt was stopped in the English Channel by a British fleet under Admiral Fielding. There was a conflict, Bylandt was forced to strike his flag, and the victors took five of the merchantmen. The Dutch government protested, but a British admiralty court laid down the astonishing principle that, by her geographical position, Great Britain naturally blockaded the ports of France and Spain and that she was entitled to avail herself of this position as the beneficiary of Providence. The Dutch declined to accept "this interpretation of the law and theology of the matter" and appealed to Catherine of Russia asking her to assist in the protection of neutral trade. Before the protest arrived, Catherine had taken action. December 30

Catherine the Great

Catherine was the widow of the czar who, in the Seven Years' war, had carried Russia over to the side of Frederick the Great. At her court were two rival parties headed respectively by Prince Potemkin who inclined toward England, and by Count Panin, the minister of foreign affairs, who, partly through his friendship for the 1780 king of Prussia, opposed the advances of England. Frederick, who had not forgotten his desertion by England in 1761, brought about more friendly relations between Russia and France and covertly struck a blow at English interests.

Catherine II. of Russia
(From miniature in collection of the New York Public Library)

A New Maritime Code

Early in 1780, the Spanish seized some Russian ships, and Catherine ordered her navy to be prepared for active service.

March 8

In March, she proclaimed a new maritime code that enunciated the principles that neutral vessels may freely sail from port to port even of belligerent powers, that free ships free all goods except contraband of war, and that no port is to be considered blockaded unless the blockading force is able to make entry to the port really dangerous. "Her imperial majesty, in manifesting these principles before all Europe, is firmly resolved to maintain them. She has therefore given an order to fit out a considerable portion of her naval forces to act as her honor, her interest, and necessity may require."

The Armed Neutrality

The principles thus enunciated were accepted by France, Spain, and the United States. Russia, Sweden, and Denmark entered into an agreement for the mutual protection of their commerce, and the league, known as the "Armed Neutrality," was joined by the Netherlands, Prussia, the German Empire, Portugal, Turkey, and the kingdom of Naples. England's navy was more powerful than the combined navies of the leagued powers, but Russia's friendship was much desired and openly to defy the league would not be wise. At war with the United States, France, and Spain and hampered with troubles in Ireland, England was brought sharply face to face with the whole maritime power of the world.

December

ATTITUDE OF EUROPEAN STATES TOWARD THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

(Prepared by David Maydole Matteson, A. M.)

1780 English and Dutch Difficulties

Since the accession of William of Orange to the English throne in 1689, England and the Netherlands had been in alliance. The Dutch carried on a large trade with the United States chiefly through the West Indian island of Saint Eustatius and a still greater trade with France. Commercial jealousies were strong and the English felt aggrieved because the Dutch had not lived up to the treaty agreements to assist England when attacked by either France or Spain. The Dutch, on their part, held up an old treaty providing that if Holland or England went to war with a third nation, the commerce of the one at peace should not be disturbed by the other. Fielding's firing on the flag-ship of Count Bylandt had aroused great bitterness in the Netherlands; the British were almost equally indignant because the Dutch had allowed John Paul Jones to remain ten weeks in the Texel. The new maritime code gave great protection to Dutch commerce, but it would not be wise to go to war because Holland had joined the "Armed Neutrality." Some other pretext must be found.

The Pretext

In September, 1780, a British vessel captured an American packet carrying Henry Laurens who was on his way to negotiate a loan in the Netherlands. Among his papers was the draft of a commercial treaty drawn up two years before and signed by Van Berckel, the chief magistrate of Amsterdam. The paper had not been ratified by the Dutch government and had no validity, but England demanded prompt satisfaction and an exemplary punishment of Van Berckel. The Dutch government disavowed the act, but, owing to the decentralized Dutch constitution, it was more difficult for the states general to find a way to punish the magistrate of a particular city than it is for the United States to inflict punishment for the murder of Italians in New Orleans or Chinese in San Francisco. The reply of the states general was held to be evasive and England declared war. It was evident that the accession of the Dutch to the "Armed Neutrality" was the real cause of the war, but Catherine evaded their demand for aid, alleging that the quarrel grew out of an incident with which the league had nothing to do. This reluctance of Catherine left the "Armed Neutrality" little more than an "armed nullity." 1781

Rodney Takes Saint Eustatius

The British ministry at once sent orders to Rodney to seize Saint Eustatius. On the third of February, 1781, Rodney appeared before the island. The governor, ignorant that war had been declared and unable to make any defense, surrendered. The booty was immense, in value more than fifteen million dollars. "This rock of only six miles in length and three in breadth," Rodney wrote to his wife, "has done England more harm than all the arms of her most potent enemies, and alone supported the infamous American rebellion." He determined to leave it, "instead of the greatest emporium upon earth, a mere desert and only known by report." Public and private property was seized and many of the plundered inhabitants were forced to leave the island. "With stratagem perhaps not illegal but certainly not glorious, the Dutch flag was kept flying" in order that Dutch, French, Spanish, and American vessels might be decoyed into the roadstead and seized as a part of the spoils. According to Rodney, more than fifty American vessels were thus taken.

A Statue Over-gilt

England's treatment of the Dutch and her capture of Saint Eustatius brought their own retribution. While on its way to Europe, a large part of the booty was captured by a French fleet. Another part was lost when Saint Eustatius was taken by a French force as it was before the end of the year. Even the plunder that was sold by the British went at a low price and much of it ultimately came into the possession of England's enemies at a cheaper rate than it would if the island had remained in the hands of the Dutch. England had now to face still another enemy. Most important of all to America, while Rodney lingered at Saint Eustatius gathering the spoil, the comte de Grasse, with a French fleet, "slipped around the shoulder of Martinique and joined the other French ships in the roadstead of Fort Royal." This junction was pregnant with momentous consequences.

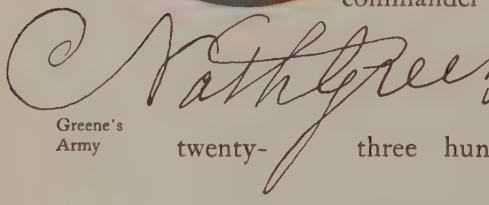

CHAPTER XIII

THE RECLAMATION OF THE CAROLINAS

General Greene

NATHANAEL Greene was the son of a Rhode Island Quaker farmer and blacksmith. An ardent patriot, he joined a militia company called the Kentish guards and was expelled from the Society of Friends. Foreseeing the impending conflict, he studied military science and, at the outbreak of the war, was made a brigadier-general. He commanded the Rhode Island forces before Boston, was made a major-general, and, but for an inopportune illness, would have been in command of the American forces in the battle of Long Island. He was in the battles at Harlem Heights, Trenton, Brandywine, Germantown, and elsewhere and served for a time as quartermaster-general. In October, 1780, Washington selected him to succeed Gates as commander of the southern department.

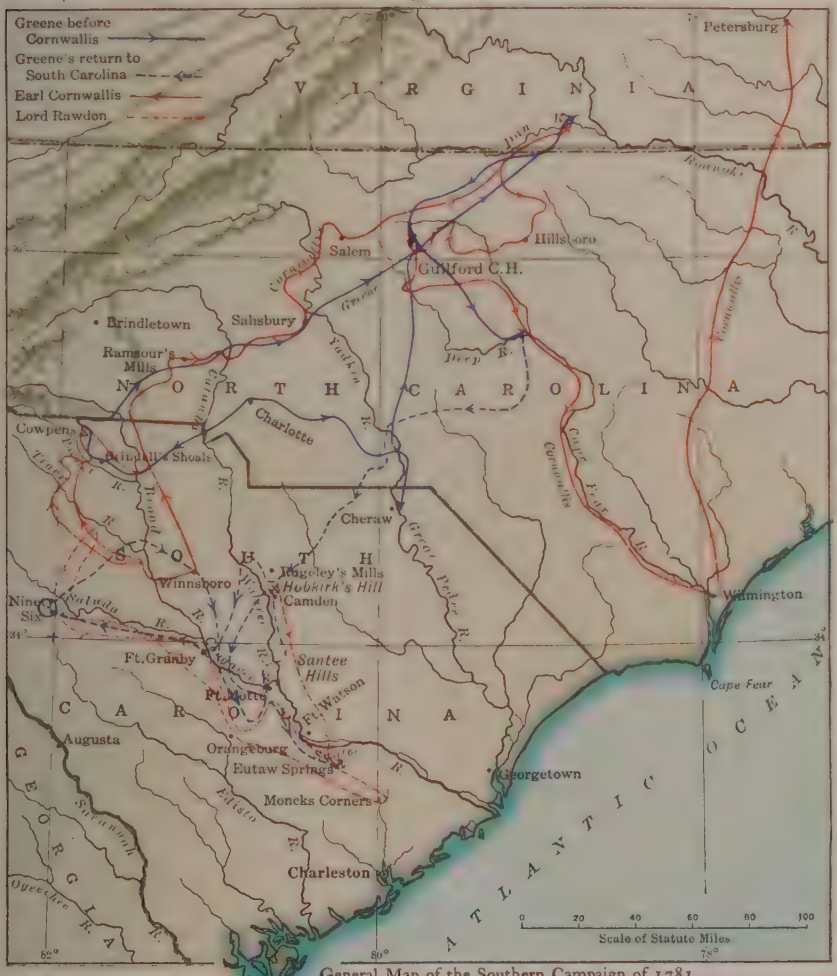

Greene's Army

On the second of December, Greene took command of the American army at Charlotte, about twenty-three hundred discouraged men, half-fed and ill-clothed and many of them defiant of discipline. The number of regulars did not exceed eleven hundred. In front of them and in a country infested with Tories was an army superior in numbers, equipment, and discipline, elated with victory, and commanded by the most enterprising officers that the

1780

General Map of the Southern Campaign of 1781

DETAIL MAP OF THE SOUTHERN CAMPAIGN OF 1781

(Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.)

British had in America—Cornwallis, Rawdon, and Tarleton. General Leslie with a thousand British troops had arrived at Charleston and was under orders to march at once to Camden. By necessity, Greene reversed Gates's plan of campaign and adopted the Fabian tactics of which John Adams had been tired long before. With Greene was Kosciuszko as engineer; Steuben was in Virginia endeavoring to forward reinforcements and supplies; Lieutenant-colonel William Washington and Lieutenant-colonel Henry Lee, "Light-horse Harry," the captor of Paulus Hook and later the father of Robert E. Lee, were in command of the cavalry; and Sumter, Marion, and other partisan leaders were still in the field. Upon these partisan leaders and their bands depended largely the success or failure of the attempt to redeem the South. 1780 1781

Morgan's Advance December 16

Greene sent Morgan with a force of about six hundred men, including the famous Maryland brigade and Washington's cavalry, to cross the Catawba and take command in that quarter, spirit up the people, and annoy the enemy. Morgan took up a position at Grindall's Shoals on the Pacolet and was joined by Pickens and other officers with several hundred volunteers. From this position he threatened Ninety Six and the entire line of British posts at the west. With the main body of his army, now consisting of about eleven hundred men, Greene advanced to a position on the east side of the Pedee nearly opposite Cheraw Hill. Meanwhile, Marion was keeping up his raids at the eastward.

Autograph of Andrew Pickens

December 26

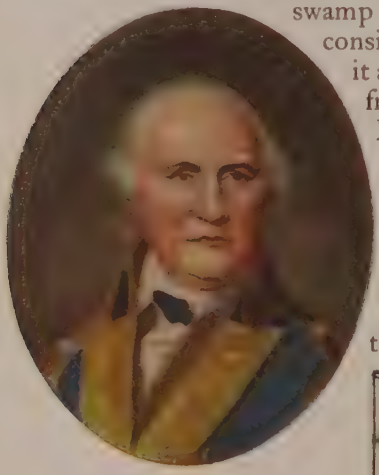

Tarleton's Advance January 1

Fearing that Morgan might capture Ninety Six, Cornwallis sent Tarleton to drive Morgan across the Broad River, while he advanced from Winnsboro leaving orders for General Leslie, who was coming from Charleston with reinforcements, to follow. Pushing forward with his accustomed rapidity, Tarleton crowded Morgan over the Pacolet and then, crossing this stream at an upper ford, drove him back to a grazing ground known as Hannah's Cowpens.

January 16

1781 The Battle-ground

Morgan's choice of ground, with an unfordable river on his left and in his rear, was peculiar. Morgan himself has explained it thus: "I would not have had a swamp in the view of my militia on any consideration; they would have made for it and nothing could have detained them from it. And as to covering my wings, I knew my adversary and was perfectly sure I should have nothing but downright fighting. As to retreat, it was the very thing I wished to cut off all hope of. I would have thanked Tarleton had he surrounded me with his cavalry. It would have been better than placing my own men in the rear to shoot down those who broke from the ranks. When men are forced to fight they will sell themselves dearly."

Daniel Morgan

The Battle Plan

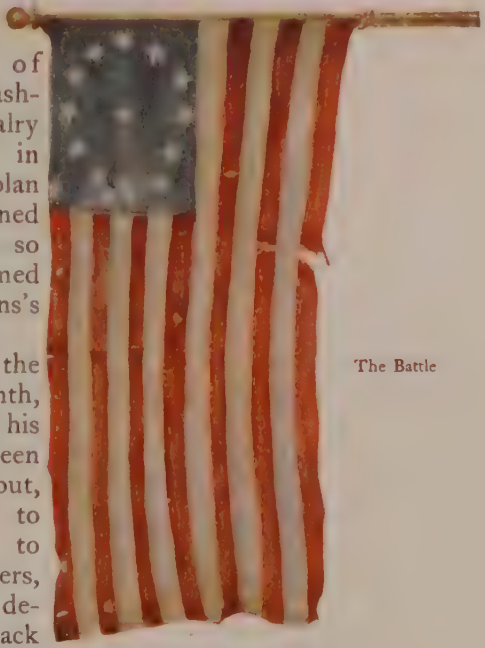

Morgan had about nine hundred and forty men with whom to oppose about eleven hundred and fifty of the enemy. A hundred and fifty yards in advance of the main line he posted two hundred and seventy militia under Pickens. Still further in advance he posted one hundred and fifty picked men deployed as skirmishers with orders to shelter themselves behind trees and not to fire until the enemy were within fifty yards; then to fall back, firing at will, upon Pickens's force which was to deliver two discharges and then take its place on the left of the main line. This main line was composed of two hundred and ninety Maryland regulars, perhaps the best fighters in the service, on the left; two companies of Virginia militia, who had served so long that they were practically regulars, in the center; and a company of Georgians on the right. Washington's and McCall's cavalry were drawn up out of sight in the rear as a reserve. The plan of battle was carefully explained to the men in the main line so that they would not be alarmed by the falling back of Pickens's militia.

Map of the Battle of Cowpens

1781

Flag of the Third Maryland Regiment
(The only national ensign known to be in existence that was used as a regimental color in the war of the Revolution. Preserved in the capitol at Annapolis)

The Battle

About eight o'clock on the morning of the seventeenth, Tarleton came in sight of his enemy. His troops had been five hours on the march, but, without giving them time to rest and eat, he advanced to the attack. According to orders, the American skirmishers delivered their fire and fell back on Pickens whose men received the enemy with firmness, firing especially at "the epaulette men." When Pickens's militia began to move across to their assigned position on the American left, the British pressed forward rapidly and with loud shouts. After some 1781 fierce fighting, Morgan ordered the American right wing to swing back and to hold its new position until Pickens could circle round and come to its assistance. Lieutenant-colonel Howard mistook the meaning of this move and the Marylanders also fell back in good order. Just then word arrived from Colonel Washington that the enemy were "coming like a mob—give them a fire and I will charge them." The British were within thirty yards and shouting tumultuously when Morgan ordered his men "to face about and give them one fire, and the victory is ours." The Americans faced about, gave a deadly fire, and then charged. At this moment, Pickens appeared on the British left and a cry of "Tarleton's quarter!" ran along the line. Caught between two fires, most of the British threw down their arms and surrendered. In point of tactics, it was the most brilliant battle of the war. Two standards, thirty-five wagons, two cannons, eight hundred muskets, and about six hundred prisoners were among the trophies of the battle. One hundred and eighty-four British were killed and wounded; the American loss was only eleven killed and sixty-one wounded—a remarkable feature of a remarkable battle. Tarleton himself escaped and reported an "unaccountable panick" and a "decisive rout." Awake to Morgan's good qualities at last, congress presented him with a gold medal. 1781

Medal awarded by Congress to Daniel Morgan for his Victory at Cowpens

Knowing of the coming of Cornwallis, Morgan crossed the Broad River that night and forded the Catawba on the twenty-fourth. On the same night, Cornwallis reached Ramsour's Mills and halted there two days to collect supplies and to burn surplus baggage. When he reached the Catawba on the twenty-ninth, heavy rains had raised the river so that it could not be forded. It was fortunate for the Americans that the rise did not come a few hours sooner. Meanwhile, Greene had heard of the battle and, leaving the main body of his army in command of General Huger, hurried with a small escort to join Morgan whom he reached on the night of the thirtieth; Cornwallis was only eighteen miles away. Crossing the Catawba, Cornwallis pursued Greene and Morgan and captured the rearmost American wagons at the Yadkin. The river was rising and Cornwallis had to wait four days before he could cross it. Another race then took place for the River Dan, and again the Americans won. Cornwallis now gave up the chase and, at Hillsboro, issued a proclamation announcing the conquest of North Carolina. Huger brought up the troops that had been left at the Cheraws and Greene, with an army that numbered about forty-four hundred men, recrossed the Dan and offered battle at Guilford Court House (Greensboro, North Carolina). It was in these dark days that Maryland ratified the articles of confederation. If Greene and his army were to be saved, they must work out their

Cornwallis in Pursuit

January 25

Arms of Nathanael Greene

February 3

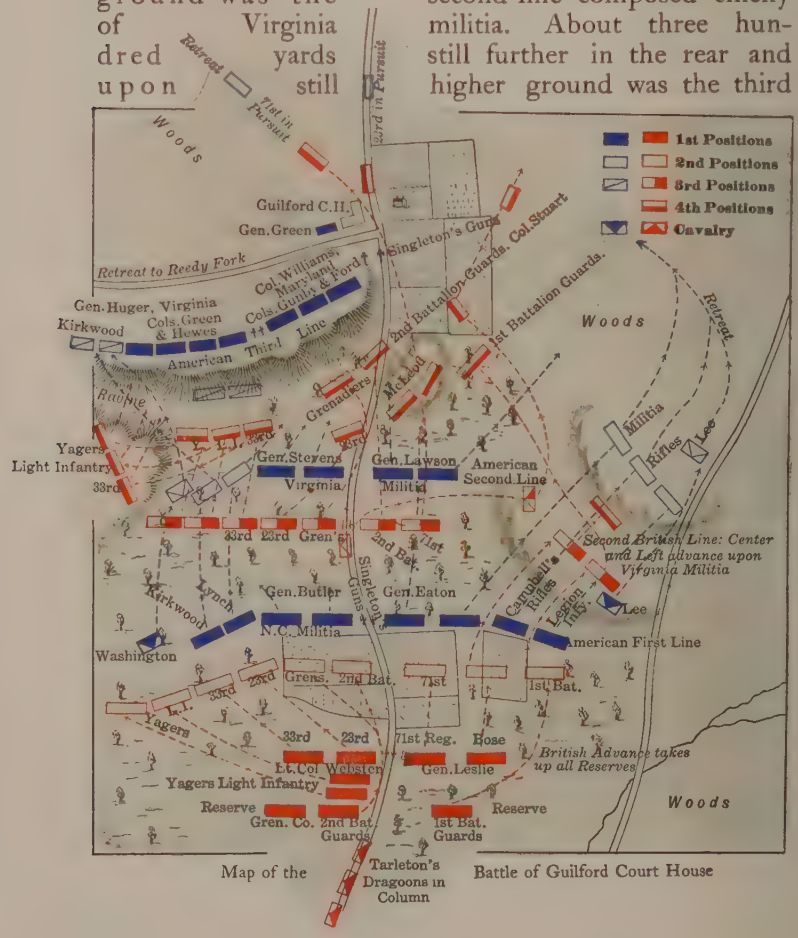

February 23

March 1

1781 own salvation; they could hope for no help from Washington or from congress.

Battle of Guilford Court House March 15

Cornwallis had but twenty-two hundred men, but he accepted the challenge and moved to the attack. The American first line, chiefly North Carolina militia, was formed behind a fence in the edge of the woods with open ground in front. In the road at the middle of the line was Captain Singleton with two pieces of artillery. About three hundred yards in the rear and on higher ground was the second line composed chiefly of Virginia militia. About three hundred yards still further in the rear and upon still higher ground was the third line composed entirely of regulars, many of whom had never been in action. Ill health had forced Morgan to retire. After some artillery firing, the British advance moved steadily across the open ground in front of the American first line, taking up its reserves so that the line thus formed was coextensive with the American first line. When the British were within one hundred and forty yards of the fence, the North Carolina militia delivered a partial volley and fled. The British center and left wing swept on at bayonet charge against the American second line which was forced to give way and to seek cover behind the continental troops or in the woods. Meantime, the British right was engaged with Campbell and Lee more than a mile away. When the British advanced against the American third line, the continentals delivered a well-directed fire and, with the bayonet, drove the assailing column back across a ravine to a hill in its rear. Tarleton says that, at this time, the event of the action was doubtful, but Cornwallis succeeded in rallying his men and, by magnificent fighting against heavy odds, drove the Americans from the field and captured their artillery. Tarleton says that "Earl Cornwallis did not think it advisable for the British cavalry to charge the enemy who were retreating in good order." The American loss, including the missing, was thirteen hundred and eleven, that of the British, five hundred and forty-four. The battle-ground is now maintained as a park.

Map of the Battle of Guilford Court House

1781

Grenadier of the Twenty-Third Foot (British)
(Drawn by Harry A. Ogden)

1781 A Barren Victory

"The British had the name: the Americans the good consequences of victory," wrote Ramsey and, in the house of commons, Fox said that "another such victory would ruin the British army." Cornwallis proclaimed a great victory but he found himself so far from any support that he slowly marched his army to Wilmington, the only place in North Carolina left in the possession of the British. Greene rested his men for two days at Troublesome Creek, eighteen miles from Guilford, and then set out to follow Cornwallis. "And now the singular spectacle was presented of the victor retreating by circuitous ways for two hundred miles, while the vanquished followed him up close, offering battle in vain." Greene pursued as far as the Deep River where the Virginia militia refused longer service. Their time was up—and so was the pursuit. Cornwallis reached Wilmington on the seventh of April and decided to leave the defense of South Carolina and of Georgia to Lord Rawdon who had been left to his fate at Camden and to march northward into Virginia where a British force was operating under Generals Phillips and Arnold. Marching from Wilmington on the twenty-fifth of April, he reached Petersburg without serious opposition and formed a junction with Arnold (Phillips having just died) on the twentieth of May.

March 18

Lantern used in Cornwallis's Army

Battle of Hobkirks Hill or Camden Second

Instead of following Cornwallis, Greene sent Lee to join Marion and to cut the line of communication between Charleston and Camden. On the eighteenth of April, he took up a position at Hobkirks Hill two miles north of Camden and, on the twenty-third, Lee and Marion captured Fort Watson on the Santee. Rawdon felt that his only chance was to attack Greene before Sumter, Marion, and Lee brought up their forces. On the morning of the twenty-fifth, he advanced with about nine hundred men to give battle. The American for-Cornwallis Retreating!

PHILADELPHIA, April 7, 1781.

Extract of a Letter from Major-General Greene, dated CAMP, at Buffalo Creek, March 25, 1781.

"ON the 16th Inſtant I wrote your Excellency, giving an Account of an Action which happened at Guilford Court-Houſe the Day before. I was then perſuaded that notwithſtanding we were obliged to give up the Ground, we had reaped the Advantage of the Action. Circumſtances ſince confirm me in Opinion that the Enemy were too much galled to improve their Succeſs. We lay at the Iron-Works three Days, preparing ourſelves for another Action, and expecting the Enemy to advance: But of a ſudden they took their Departure, leaving behind them evident Marks of Diſtreſs. All our wounded at Guilford, which had fallen into their Hands, and 70 of their own, too bad to move, were left at New-Garden. Moſt of their Officers ſuffered-- Lord Cornwallis had his Horſe ſhot under him--Col. Steward, of the Guards was killed, General O Hara and Cols. Tarlton and Webſter, wounded. Only three Field-Officers eſcaped, if Reports, which ſeem to be authentic, can be relied on.

Our Army are in good Spirits, notwithſtanding our Sufferings, and are advancing towards the Enemy; they are retreating to Croſs-Creek.

In South-Carolina, Generals Sumpter and Marian have gained ſeveral little Advantages. In one the Enemy loſt 60 Men, who had under their Care a large Quantity of Stores, which were taken, but by an unfortunate Miſtake were afterwards re taken.

Publiſhed by Order,

CHARLES THOMSON, Secretary.

§†§: Printed at N. Willis's Office.

BROADSIDE ANNOUNCING CORNWALLIS'S RETREAT AFTER THE BATTLE OF GUILFORD COURT HOUSE

(From copy in the New York Public Library, Emmet Collection)

mation was much like that of the reserve line at the battle of Guilford. The three guns that had just arrived were masked in the center and orders were given for the regiments on their right and left to open for their fire and then to charge the enemy with the bayonet. Colonel Washington and his cavalry were sent to double the flank and take the enemy in the rear. As the British advanced, their reserves were brought to the front as at Guilford. At a critical moment, Ford fell severely wounded and his men hesitated; Captain Beatty of Gunby's regiment was mortally wounded and his company fell back in disorder. When Gunby retired the other companies to reform his regiment, the movement gave the idea of a retreat, even the first Maryland broke, and the day was lost. The Americans fell back to Rugeleys Mills taking their cannons with them, and the British retired to Camden. Few were killed on either side and the dead alone held the field of battle. Then South Carolina rose in arms and Lord Rawdon prepared to retreat. He burned his bag-

1781

Map of the Battle of Hobkirks Hill

1781 gage and stores, set fire to the prison, and left Camden little more than a heap of ruins. On the night of the tenth of May, he crossed the Wateree at Camden Ferry and retreated to Monck's Corners, only thirty miles from Charleston.

The Siege of Ninety Six

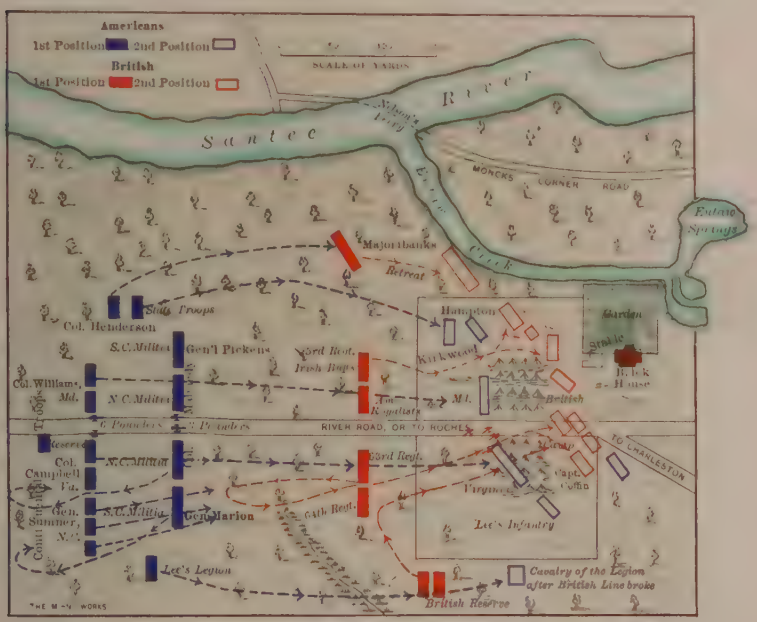

Sumter occupied Orangeburg on the eleventh of May, Marion and Lee captured Fort Mott on the twelfth, Lee reduced Granby on the fifteenth, and Augusta was surrendered by the British on the fifth of June. Other posts were taken or evacuated until Ninety Six was the only place that the British held in the up-country of the Carolinas and, since the twenty-second of May, Greene and Kosciuszko had been besieging that. On the third of June, three regiments from Ireland arrived at Charleston for Cornwallis, but two of them were used for the relief of Ninety Six and the other was sent by sea to reinforce Sir James Wright at Savannah; even Georgia was in peril. On the seventh of June, Rawdon marched with seventeen hundred of these recruits from Charleston to raise the siege of Ninety Six; at Monck's Corners he was joined by the troops that he had left there. Greene was sapping Colonel Cruger's principal redout when he heard of Rawdon's approach and made an assault on the morning of the nineteenth. The siege was raised on the twenty-first and the American army crossed the Saluda and retired northward, pursued by Rawdon and his troops. When the new recruits were nearly worn out by chasing the wary Americans, Rawdon returned to Ninety Six, destroyed the works that it was impossible for him to hold, and withdrew the garrison. Greene then marched his army to the High Hills of the Santee for rest during the extreme summer heat. Meanwhile, partisan warfare, in which little quarter was given by either side, continued. 1781

Map of the Siege of Ninety Six

During this period of comparative inaction, Lord Rawdon sailed for home leaving Colonel Alexander Stewart in command of the British forces with headquarters at Orangeburg. On the twenty-second of Battle of Eutaw Springs

Map of the Battle of Eutaw Springs

August, Greene advanced with an army that had been reinforced by seven hundred continentals under General Jethro Sumner and now numbered about twenty-six hundred men. Stewart fell back to Eutaw Springs about sixty miles from Charleston where, on the morning of the eighth of September, Greene attacked him. The formation of the two armies is clearly shown by the accom-

1781 panying topographical illustration. For want of bread, Colonel Stewart had been, as he says in his report, "under the necessity of sending out rooting parties, from each corps, under an officer, to collect potatoes every morning at daybreak." On this particular morning, the unarmed detachment from the "Irish Buffs," going too far to the front, "found the vanguard of General Greene's army, which they were not seeking, and left the sweet potatoes, which they were seeking." A number of the "Buffs" were taken prisoners and the chase added zest to the American advance. The more formal opening of the battle was made about nine o'clock. The action on both sides was vigorous, but when the American second line was brought up at a bayonet charge and the reserve came to their support, the British left wing gave way and the men fled in disorder through their camp to the cover of a brick house which, with its palisaded garden fence, was to Eutaw Springs what the Chew House was to Germantown. While the British officers were reforming their lines, a part of the American army fell to plundering the British camp and drinking rum; the result need not be told in detail. The American lack of discipline, the brick house, the garden wall, and a British rally saved Colonel Stewart's army.

Flag of Colonel William Washington's Cavalry Troop, commonly called the Eutaw Standard
(In possession of the Washington Light Infantry Corps of Charleston, South Carolina. We are greatly indebted to Captain W. S. Lanneau, of the Washington Light Infantry, for assistance in securing a colored photograph of it)

The Americans were driven from the field. Their loss amounted to about four hundred, including Lieutenant-colonel Washington who was wounded and taken prisoner. The British lost nearly three hundred more. 1781

Again, Greene's defeat was equivalent to a victory. On the night of the ninth, Stewart, after destroying a thousand stands of arms, fell back to Monck's Corners pursued for nearly thirty miles by Marion and Lee. The British were now confined to the districts about Charleston and Savannah. By the fifteenth, Greene was again at his camp at the High Hills of the Santee. For the rest of the war there were no engagements of great importance in the South. The campaign resolved itself into a series of partisan conflicts, of which more will be said in a later chapter. The Dying Embers

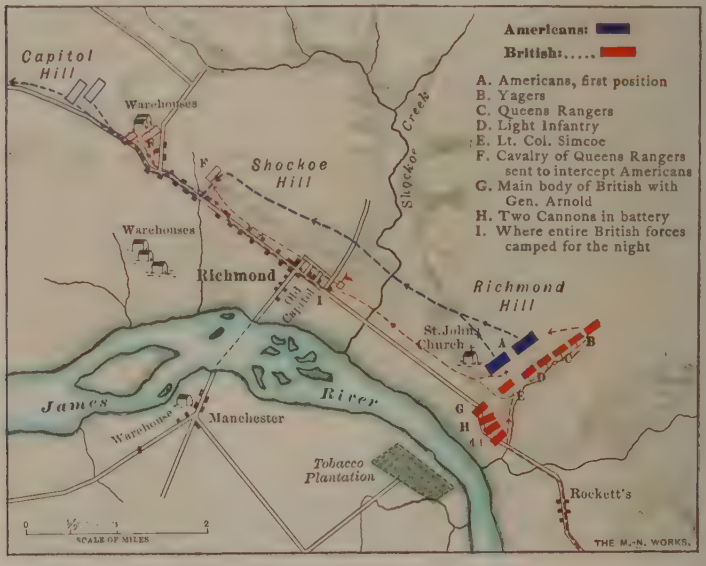

CHAPTER XIV

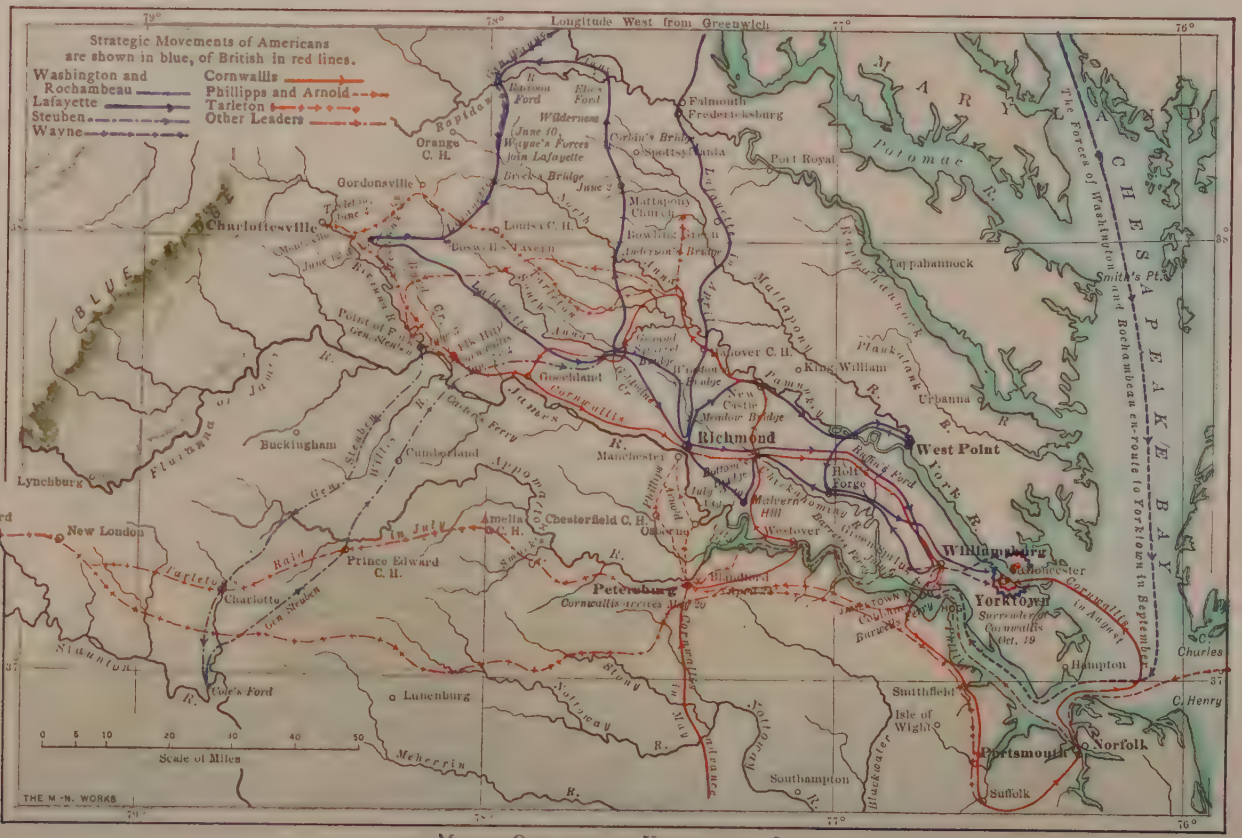

THE FINAL BLOW

Benedict Arnold in Virginia

IN October, 1780, General Clinton had sent General Leslie into Virginia. Leslie occupied Portsmouth and Norfolk, but, after the affair at King's Mountain, he was sent to South Carolina. Clinton did not, however, give up the idea of isolating the South by the conquest of Virginia. In December, General Arnold sailed from New York with sixteen hundred British

Map of Arnold's Position at Richmond, January 5, 1781

MAP OF OPERATIONS IN VIRGINIA IN 1781

1781 January 5

regulars, ascended the James River, and captured Richmond. A great deal of private property was destroyed and part of the city was burned. Hearing that Steuben was at Petersburg, Arnold hastened back to save his line of retreat and to prepare for the defense of Portsmouth.

Lafayette in Virginia

As early as the twentieth of February, 1781, congress assigned the task of capturing Arnold to Lafayette who was given a picked corps of twelve hundred men from the New England and New Jersey lines. Feigning an attack on Staten Island, Lafayette led his troops to the Head of Elk where he arrived on the third of March, three days ahead of schedule time. Thence his troops went by water to Annapolis. To coöperate with Lafayette, Washington proposed to Rochambeau that the French fleet that had been blockaded at Newport be sent to the Chesapeake and, with some of the ships, Destouches tardily put to sea. At the Virginia capes, Destouches found Arbuthnot and a British fleet. After the engagement that took place, the French ships went back to Newport for repairs. Meanwhile, Lafayette had left his army at Annapolis and hurried on to Yorktown for a conference with Steuben, and to Suffolk where he found Muhlenberg with the Virginia militia. After the return of the French fleet, Lafayette hastened to Annapolis and thence led his troops northward. At the Head of Elk he received orders from Washington assigning him to the command in Virginia, superseding Steuben who, as usual, accepted the order without question. At Baltimore, Lafayette bought shoes and cotton cloth, for which he paid with drafts on the French treasury personally endorsed by himself; the women of Baltimore made the cloth into shirts. Lafayette gave the shoes and shirts to his men and set out on a forced march for Richmond where he arrived on the twenty-ninth of April. 1781

Map of Operations on the Chesapeake Bay, March, 1781

March 16

General Phillips and his Raid

Late in March, Major-general William Phillips arrived in the Chesapeake Bay with two thousand British troops from New York, took command at Portsmouth, and completed the fortifications that Arnold had begun.

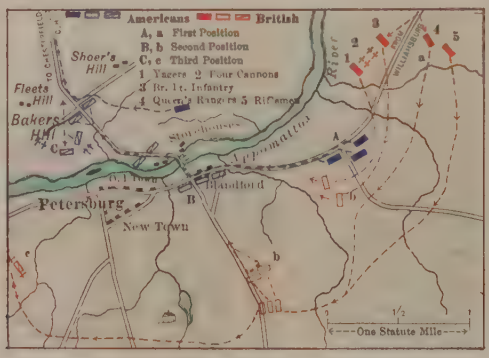

Overshoes worn by Lafayette

Uniform of Lafayette's Light Infantry
(Drawn by Harry A. Ogden)

In April, he sailed up the James River as far as Burwell's Ferry and thence marched to Williamsburg whence the militia fled. Lafayette was then advancing on Richmond, and Steuben, with about a thousand militia, was at Petersburg. On the twenty-fourth, the British army sailed to City Point and, on the twenty-fifth, marched for Petersburg. After a skirmish at a hill east of Blandford, now an eastern suburb of Petersburg, April 20

1781

Map of Phillips's Position at Petersburg

Steuben's feeble force safely crossed the Appomattox. Arnold says that "the enemy took up the bridge, which prevented our pursuing them." Four thousand hogsheads of tobacco and a number of vessels were destroyed. On the twenty-seventh, Phillips marched to Chesterfield Court House and burned the barracks there; on the same day, Arnold marched to Osborne and burned some vessels. On the thirtieth, the British army marched to Manchester and destroyed twelve hundred hogsheads of tobacco. Across the river at Richmond was Lafayette with nine hundred men, helpless spectators of the conflagration. On the ninth of May, the British army returned to Petersburg to meet Cornwallis. Here Phillips was stricken with typhoid fever and, on the thirteenth of May, he died. Cornwallis arrived on the twentieth, and, in June, Arnold returned to New York much to the disappointment of the Americans who had hoped to take him; Jefferson had offered a reward of five thousand guineas for his capture. In the campaign, Arnold is said to have asked a captured captain: "What would be my fate, if I should be taken prisoner?" "They will cut off that shortened leg of yours wounded at Quebec and Saratoga, and bury it with all the honors of war, and then hang the rest of you on a gibbet," was the answer.

Cornwallis and his Race with Lafayette

The arrival of Cornwallis brought the British army in Virginia up to more than five thousand men, double that of Lafayette who found himself, as he expressed it "not strong enough even to be beaten." When Cornwallis advanced against him, Lafayette abandoned Richmond and retreated across the Rapidan. Cornwallis then sent Tarleton to scatter the legislature at Charlottesville and to capture Governor Jefferson. A few members of the legislature were taken and Jefferson had not more than five minutes to spare when he left his home at Monticello. Cornwallis, meanwhile, was in hot pursuit and, for a time, the country between the James and the Rappahannock was well warmed with the marchings of the marquis and the earl. Cornwallis wrote: "The boy cannot escape me," but Lafayette moved quickly and, on the tenth of June, was opportunely reinforced by Wayne with about eight hundred men of the Virginia line and other troops. Cornwallis, who had advanced as far westward as Point of Forks, retreated to Richmond and thence to Williamsburg. 1781 June 4

June 4

At Williamsburg, Cornwallis received letters from Clinton saying that New York was threatened and calling for help. On the sixth of June, Lord Germain wrote to Clinton that "Lord Cornwallis's opinion entirely coincides with mine, of the great importance of pushing the war on the side of Virginia with all the force that can be spared." On the fourth of July, Cornwallis began to fall back toward Portsmouth and Lafayette followed; in the ensuing action at Green Spring, the Americans were repulsed with a loss of more than a hundred men. Cornwallis reached Portsmouth in safety and, on the twentieth of July, received orders countermanding his instructions for the shipment of troops to New York. Early in August, he removed to Yorktown and Gloucester, and, later in the month, by adding the garrison of Portsmouth to his army, had about seven thousand men. Lafayette took up a position at Malvern Hill; after Cornwallis moved to Yorktown, he occupied Holt's Forge Cornwallis Occupies Yorktown July 6

Coat of Arms of Cornwallis

1781 on the Pamunky, and sent Wayne to the south side of the James to oppose any movement to reinforce Rawdon and to be in readiness to join Greene if Cornwallis should withdraw from the state. Throughout a difficult campaign, Lafayette had displayed commendable zeal and discretion. The stage had now been set for the final act, to understand which, we must turn first to the North.

Apathy and Mutiny

In that section the outlook for the Americans had been only a little less gloomy than it was in the South. Food, clothing, and money were as scarce as they had ever been, and hope deferred had brought on a sort of apathy. The winter brought little relief from toil and none from suffering. The soldiers were often without food, were exposed without proper clothing to the rigors of winter, and had served almost twelve months without pay. The Pennsylvania line, about fifteen hundred men who in their huts at Morristown were exposed to the piercing cold in "old worn-out coats, tattered linen overalls, and but one blanket between three men," mutinied, killed a captain who tried to suppress the movement, and, in spite of all that General Wayne could do, marched toward Philadelphia to force congress to give them redress. The men, however, remained loyal to the cause and gave up to be hanged as spies two British agents sent by Clinton to persuade them to desert. At Trenton, on the tenth, they were met by Joseph Reed, president of the Pennsylvania council, and by a congressional committee. The mutiny was finally suppressed by a wise application of concession, persuasion, and force. Lafayette wrote to his wife: "Human nature has its limits, no European army would suffer the tenth part of what the Americans suffer. It takes citizens to support hunger, nakedness, toil, and the total want of pay, which constitute the condition of our soldiers, the hardiest and the most patient that are to be found in the world."

January 1

Pluto Lends a Helping Hand

To tide the country over the crisis, Lieutenant-colonel John Laurens, son of the Henry Laurens who was then a prisoner in London Tower, was sent on a special and almost hopeless mission to France to secure a loan and naval assistance. After hearing that Laurens was coming, Vergennes declared that "Congress relies too much on France for subsidies to maintain their army. They must absolutely refrain from such exorbitant demands. The great expenses of the war render it impossible for France to meet these demands if persisted in." After his departure, Washington wrote to Laurens: "I give it decisively as my opinion that without a foreign loan, our present force (which is but the remnant of an army) cannot be kept together this campaign. . . . It may be declared in a word that we are at the end of our tether, and that now or never our deliverance must come." Upon his arrival in Paris, Laurens, with little adherence to diplomatic forms, declared that money was a necessity and even hinted that, if it was not obtained, the time might come when the United States would be found fighting with England against France. Although French finances were badly involved, six million livres (more than a million dollars) was promised. Franklin had already secured a loan of four million livres and Vergennes had agreed to guarantee a Dutch loan of ten million livres. On the twenty-fifth of August, Laurens arrived at Boston with clothing, ammunition, and half a million hard dollars.

1781

April 9

Rochambeau Joins Washington

Before Laurens's arrival, the plan for striking the final blow had been evolved. Wash-

MAP OF WASHINGTON'S AND ROCHAMBEAU'S MARCH TO YORKTOWN

(Compiled by Lieutenant Joseph A. Baer, U. S. Army, West Point, N. Y.)

MANUSCRIPT MAP (IN FRENCH) OF THE POSITI
AT PHILLIPSBU
(In colors from original at the Ne

ɔN OF THE AMERICAN AND FRENCH ARMIES
RG, 1781
v York Historical Society)

ington held a conference with Rochambeau at Weathers- 1781 field, Connecticut, at which the propriety of a combined May 21 attack upon New York was considered. The chevalier de Ternay had died at Newport and the count de Barras had recently arrived at Boston with the news that the count May 8 de Grasse was in the West Indies with orders to detach a portion of his fleet "to coöperate in any undertaking which may be projected by the French and American generals." The generals agreed that the French troops should be marched from Rhode Island to the Hudson and participate in operations against New York, though the possibility of operating "against the enemy in some other quarter, as circumstances shall dictate," was kept open. On the sixth of July, the allied armies extended in a line from the Bronx to Dobbs Ferry. The junction of the two armies and the capture of dispatches revealing the intention of the allies caused Clinton great anxiety and led him to call upon Cornwallis for reinforcements. It was this call that led Cornwallis to fall back to Portsmouth.

The Man Meets the Crisis

The ratification of the articles of confederation (a feeble bond, but still a bond) testified to the continued determination of the thirteen states even after years of struggle and delay, congress replaced some of its clumsy committees with more efficient secretaries of departments, an earnest effort was made to meet the reasonable demands of the army, and even the recent mutinies had shown that the patriotism of the troops might be relied upon. Washington was given greater authority and France magnanimously put her troops under his command. On the fourteenth of August, came a letter from Grasse, dated at the Cape of Santo Domingo, announcing that, on the July 28 thirteenth of August, he would sail for the Chesapeake with from twenty-five to twenty-nine ships of the line and more than three thousand troops, but stating that his engagements with the Spaniards would not admit of his remaining later than the fifteenth of October. Here was an opportunity of which Washington resolved to take advantage. He determined to capture Cornwallis. In 1781 order to deceive Clinton, he prepared "a false demonstration against New York and a real movement against Yorktown." In letters to the governors of the northern states, he called for aid as if for an attack on New York. In letters to the authorities in Philadelphia, he defined a plan for a movement against New York by way of Staten Island. Word was also sent to Lafayette and Grasse that Cornwallis be not permitted to escape, and to Robert Morris that transportation might be in readiness at the Head of Elk, and stores provided.

On to Yorktown

With a reticence and strategy that his own officers could not fathom, Washington prepared for the demonstration and the movement. The undertaking was hazardous, but its audacity worked in its favor. Taking with him two thousand continentals and Rochambeau's four thousand French troops, Washington crossed the August 19–26 Hudson and marched through New Jersey as if for Sandy Hook. Then the whole force turned and marched to Trenton where the artillery, intrenching tools, and some troops were embarked on boats. The rest of the army marched on to Philadelphia whither Washington preceded them. Here Rochambeau advanced twenty thousand dollars in gold, of which more in the following chapter. The money was paid to the continental troops who had been so long without any pay that

DIPLOMA FROM YALE COLLEGE CONFERRING DEGREE OF LL. D. ON WASHINGTON, SEPTEMBER 12, 1781

(From original in Library of Congress)

the effect "was inspiring." By this time, the secret was out and the troops, ragged continentals and gaily clad Frenchmen, were received with great enthusiasm. At Chester, on the afternoon of the fifth of September, Washington received word that Grasse was in the Chesapeake. The French admiral had arrived with frigates and transports, twenty-six ships of the line, and more than three thousand soldiers under Saint Simon. "I never saw a man so thoroughly and openly delighted," says one of Rochambeau's officers. A few months before, Grasse had joined the other French ships in the roadstead of Fort Royal while Rodney was lingering over the disposal of his rich spoil at Saint Eustatius. As Professor Jameson has pointed out, Yorktown might never have happened but for Rodney's squandering of his opportunity. On the sixth, the continentals reached the Head of Elk and, on the eighth, they were joined by the French. The admirable logistics of Lafayette in February had now been equaled by that of Washington. From the Head of Elk and from Annapolis, the troops were transported by water. Meanwhile, Washington made a flying visit to Mount Vernon—the first in six years—and entertained Rochambeau there. On the fourteenth, Washington reached Lafayette's headquarters at Williamsburg. Saint Simon had already landed his troops and united them with Lafayette's. The allies took up a strong position across the peninsula at Williamsburg where they were joined by the troops from the North. By the twenty-eighth, Cornwallis was in Washington's "mouse-trap" with four armies and two 1781

Cap worn by Captain Titcomb of Washington's Life Guard

September 10

September 2

1781

A Naval Battle

Operations on the Chesapeake Bay, in September, 1781 fleets ready to pounce upon him.

Meanwhile, all had gone ill with the British. Uncertain of Grasse's intentions, Admiral Rodney had sent Sir Samuel Hood with fourteen ships of the line to join the British squadron at New York. Hood

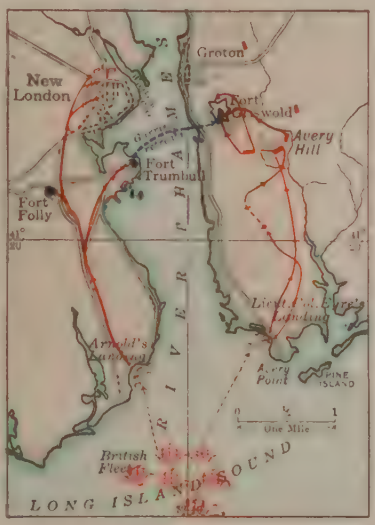

August 25 reached the Virginia capes a few days ahead of Grasse and, finding no enemy there, continued on to New York and joined Admiral Graves, only five of whose seven ships of the line were fit to go to sea. On the day of Hood's arrival, word was received that M. de Barras had put to sea with the French flotilla at Newport. Graves at once went in pursuit hoping to beat the French in detail. After looking into Delaware Bay, he sailed on to the Chesapeake. Barras had taken a roundabout route and was not there —but Grasse was. The French admiral at once slipped his cables and sailed outside the capes. In the four hours'

September 5 engagement that followed, neither side gained a victory, but Graves's fleet was so much disabled that he returned to New York. Grasse kept at sea for four days; meanwhile, Barras slipped into the Chesapeake and soon sent ships to Annapolis for such of the troops from the North as had not found transportation at the Head of Elk.

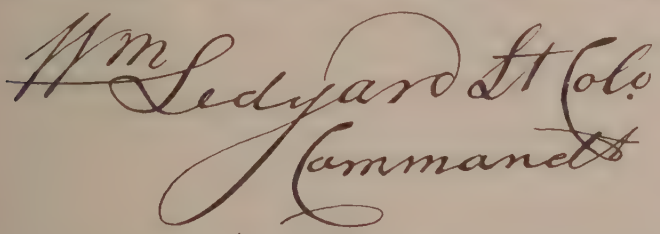

Arnold's Invasion of Connecticut

In the hope of recalling Washington to the North, Clinton sent Arnold from New York with about two thousand men on a raid into Connecticut. On the afternoon of the fifth of September, the ships came to anchor on the Long Island side of the sound, about thirty miles from the mouth of the River Thames. On the morning of the sixth, the alarm guns at New London signaled the approach of the enemy. The regular "larum" was two guns, but the numerous New London privateers were in the habit of announcing their successes by salutes of three guns on their return to port. This was known to Arnold who fired the "third gun similar to ours and timed it alike which broke our alarm which discouraged our troops coming to our assistance." The military district, on both sides of the Thames River, was commanded by Colonel William Ledyard. On the west or New London side of the river was Fort Trumbull, an unfinished water battery open from behind; on the east or Groton side was Fort Griswold, an "oblong square" with bastions and a covered way leading to another battery nearer the river. At this time, the garrisons were especially depleted, most of the men capable of bearing arms being in the field or on shipboard.

Map of Arnold's Attack on New London

Autograph of William Ledyard

1781 The Burning of New London

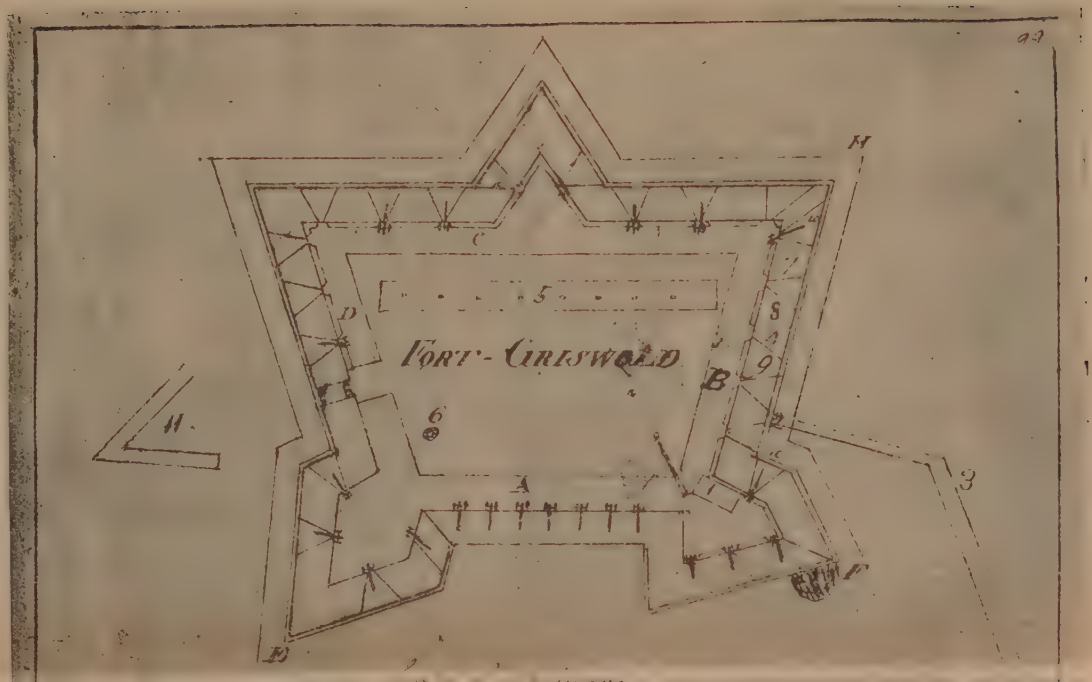

Arnold divided his troops into two divisions; one division commanded by Lieutenant-colonel Eyre, landed on the east side of the harbor; the other, commanded by Arnold in person, landed on the west side. As Arnold's column marched up the river bank toward the town, the two dozen men in Fort Trumbull fired one volley, spiked their guns, and took boat for Fort Griswold. Arnold then advanced to New London where ten or twelve ships were burned and the stores and part of the town were fired and "unfortunately destroyed."

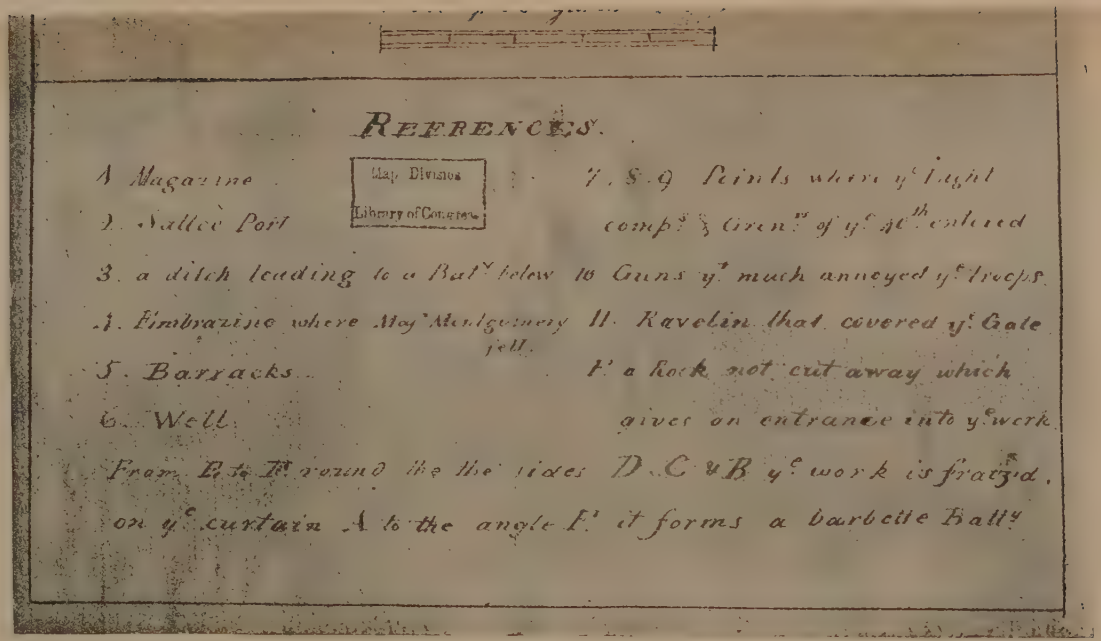

> We've nothing old; our parchment proofs,
> Our red-ink prints, our damask woofs,
> All perished with our gabled roofs,
> When Arnold burnt the town.

Thirteen miles up the river was Norwich, Arnold's birthplace and boyhood home. On that day, Washington and his troops arrived at the Head of Elk on their way to Yorktown, and Lafayette, Arnold's late antagonist in Virginia, was aged twenty-four.

At Fort Griswold

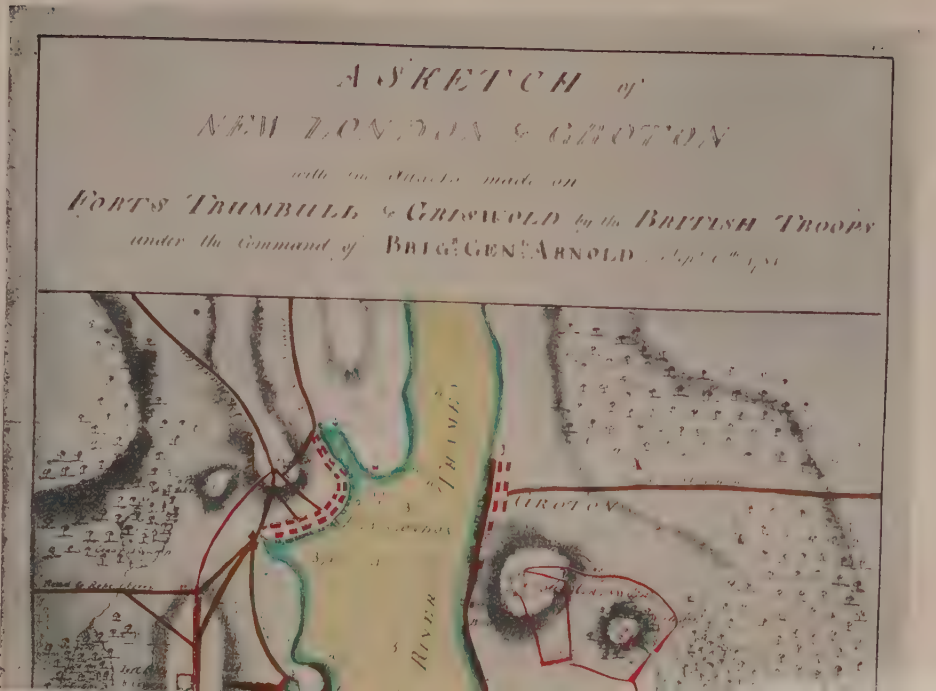

On the other side of the river, the little garrison was reinforced by the men who crossed over from Fort Trumbull and by the volunteers who came hurrying in. Most of the eight score were young men — a consequence of six years of war; Ledyard, their commander, was only forty-three. Colonel Eyre sent "to Colonel Ledyard the demand if they had to take the fort by storm they should put martial law in force, that is, whom they did not kill with balls should be put to death with sword and bayonet. Our flag went to the British flag with Colonel Ledyard's answer that he should not give up the fort to them, let the consequence be what it might." On both sides, the fighting was furious. "Tom, my son, do your duty," said a brave Groton lieutenant to the seventeen-year-old boy by his side. "Never fear, father," replied the lad — and fell. "'Tis a good cause," said the father as he fought on beside the body of his boy. When the British were swarming over the ramparts and further resistance was useless, Colonel Ledyard ordered his men to throw down their arms; so far, only three Americans had been killed. "Who commands this

FORT-GRISWOLD
A B
C
D
E
F
G
H
1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8 9

MANUSCRIPT PLAN OF FORT GRISWOLD

(Drawn about 1781, probably by an American engineer. Reproduced from original drawing in the Faden Collection of Maps in the Library of Congress)

A SKETCH of NEW LONDON & GROTON with the Attacks made on FORTS TRUMBULL & GRISWOLD by the BRITISH TROOPS under the Command of BRIG.GEN.L ARNOLD GROTON RIVER THAMES

MANUSCRIPT MAP OF NEW LONDON AND GROTON WITH THE ATTACKS ON FORTS TRUMBULL AND GRISWOLD

(Reproduced from original colored drawing in the Faden Collection of Maps in the Library of Congress)

fort?" demanded Major Bromfield, and the courtly colonel answered, "Sir, I did, but you do now," and gave up his sword. Pierced, either with that sword or another, Ledyard instantly fell and died; then the promised massacre began. When, sickened by their bloody work, the British ceased the slaughter, eighty-eight of the garrison lay dead and thirty-five were severely wounded. The British loss was greater than the total number of the defenders of the fort. As the Connecticut militia, aroused by the noise of battle, began to assemble, Arnold hastily reëmbarked his troops with the few unwounded prisoners and sailed away, while 1781

> Two score widows of Groton town
> Walked mid the corpses up and down;
> Turned the dead faces up to the light,
> Calling, calling into the night;
> . . . . . .
> Waiting, speaking,
> Questioning, seeking
> Over the torn sod, reeking
> With the blood of Groton Height.

In 1792, the Connecticut general assembly appropriated "five hundred thousand acres of the lands belonging to this State lying west of the State of Pennsylvania and bounded northerly on the shore of Lake Erie" to be divided among the New London and Groton sufferers of 1781—the "Fire Lands" of Ohio. In later years, the state built and dedicated the Groton Heights monument, a granite obelisk one hundred and thirty-five feet high. Within the monument is a marble tablet bearing the names of those who fell in the defense of Fort Griswold. May 10 September 6, 1830

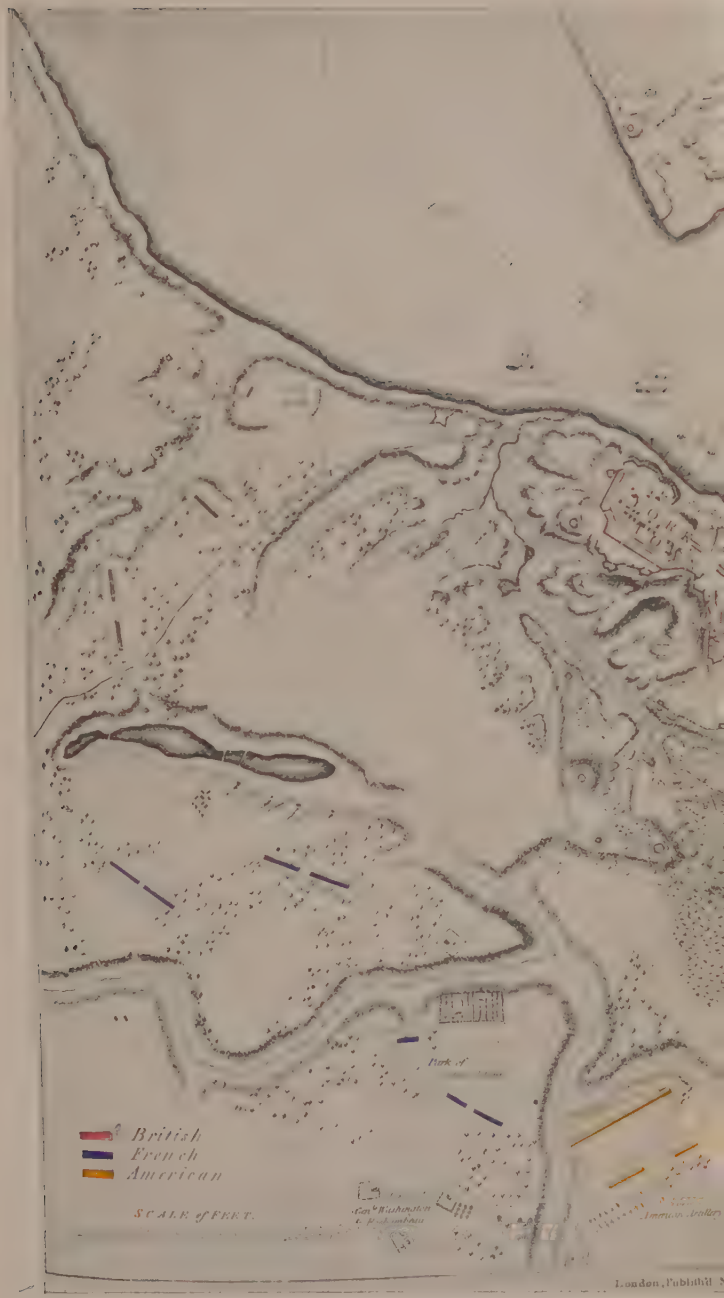

But such attempted diversions had no effect upon the Yorktown campaign. Clinton did prepare an expedition for the direct succor of Cornwallis, but he was slow in setting out and, when he reached the Virginia capes, all was over. On the twenty-eighth of September, the allies, numbering about sixteen thousand men, appeared before Yorktown. The British position had not been selected with a view to a siege and was naturally weak. The bluff occupied by the town and the works stood on the south side of the York River and between Wormley Creek on the At Yorktown

1781 east and Windmill Creek on the west. The east branch of Windmill Creek ran through a deep ravine or "gorge" in front of the town. At the mouth of this creek lay the British frigate "Guadaloupe," and, a little further up the river was a redout occupied by the Royal Welsh Fusileers. On the high ground beyond the ravine were

Map of the Siege of Yorktown

MAP OF THE SIE

(Published, London, March 1, 1787; reproduced from cop colors in collection of the New York Historical Society) several redoubts, the garrisons of which would find it difficult to recross the "gorge" under pressure from the enemy. Cornwallis therefore saved the garrisons by giving up the redoubts beyond the ravine. The works thus abandoned were promptly occupied by the French. Evidently, any advance on the town from the west, or any retreat from the town in that direction would be difficult if not impracticable. On the other side of the main defenses, the British redoubts were stronger; there, the allies made their regular siege approaches. 1781

OF YORKTOWN

Flag of the Gatinois Regiment (French)

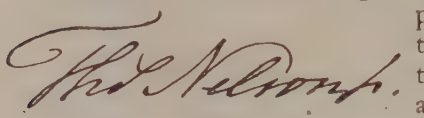

On the twenty-ninth of September, the lines of the allies were extended to envelop the flanks of the enemy and Cornwallis withdrew to his inner defenses abandoning most of his outer works; he evidently expected that Clinton would send relief. On the morning of the thirtieth, the besiegers occupied the abandoned works and began weaving around the town a semicircular web of ditches, redoubts, and batteries from the river above to the river below. On the night of the sixth of October, the first parallel was opened at a distance of five or six hundred yards from the British works. The work was advanced on the seventh and the eighth without any reply to the fire that Cornwallis kept up. At three o'clock on the after-

The American Works

Flag of the Saintonge Regiment (French)

1781 noon of the ninth, the bombardment of Yorktown was begun by the French battery on the extreme left near the bank of the river above the town; at five o'clock, an American battery on the extreme right on the river bank below opened fire. For four days, the cannonading was incessant. The British frigate "Charon," and two transports were set on fire and the "Guadaloupe" moved to the Gloucester shore to avoid the shot and shell. In June, Thomas Nelson had been elected as governor of Virginia, succeeding Jefferson, and he was now in charge of the Virginia militia before Yorktown. It is said that he was asked to direct the cannonading of the town and that he pointed out what he said was Cornwallis's headquarters—it was his own house.

Autograph of Thomas Nelson

Nelson House at Yorktown

Storming the Redouts

On the night of the eleventh, the besiegers moved under cover of the ravine and began their second parallel not more than three hundred yards from the British lines. Two redouts that Cornwallis had not abandoned were serious obstacles to the extension of this parallel to the river bank and it was resolved to take them by storm. The one on the river bank was

Flag of the Royal Deux-Ponts Regiment (French)

Private, Soissonnais Regiment

Officers of the Royal D

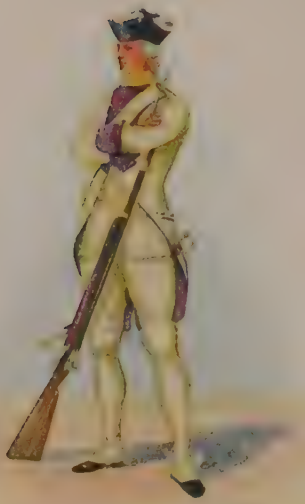

Private, Saintonge Regiment

SOME UNIFORMS OF FRENCH OFFICERS
AMERICAN REVOLUTION (Reproduced from original drawin ux-Ponts Regiment

Private, Gatinois Regiment

Private, Bourbonnais Regiment

AND PRIVATES WHO SERVED IN THE UNDER ROCHAMBEAU gs by Mr. G. Noyon, Paris) assigned to Alexander Hamilton and the American light infantry; the taking of the other and larger one devolved upon Colonel William Deux-Ponts and French chasseurs and grenadiers from the baron de Viomesnil's command. On the evening of the fourteenth, Hamilton's column charged with unloaded muskets and, in ten minutes, its work was done. At the other redout, the charge of the Hessian garrison was met with a French volley and a countercharge and, in half an hour the field-work was carried and the Hessians threw down their arms. By the morning of the fifteenth, both redouts were included in the second parallel. 1781

Trying to Escape

The firing of the allies was so effective that the British guns were almost wholly silenced while shot and shell enfiladed the town from one end to the other. By the sixteenth, says Cornwallis, "there was no part of the whole front attacked on which we could show a single gun and our shells were nearly expended." He therefore tried to escape with as many of his troops as possible. On the night of the sixteenth, one division quietly crossed the York to Gloucester which was invested by thirty-five hundred men under General Choisé. But at midnight, a violent storm arose and drove all the boats, some of them with troops on board, down the river. Such was the exposed situation of the British army when the French and American batteries opened on the morning of the seventeenth. The boats were regained and the troops brought back without much loss, but, says Cornwallis, "In the meantime, our works were going to ruin. We could not fire a single gun. . . . I therefore proposed to capitulate." At ten o'clock, a red-coated drummer mounted the Yorktown parapet and began to beat the parley. "As for being heard, he might have drummed till domesday; but he could readily be seen and the cannonading stopped." At that moment, Sir Henry Clinton was sailing down New York Bay with twenty-five ships of the line, several frigates, and seven thousand choice troops, the oft-promised "relief" for the garrison at Yorktown.

October 17

Music

1781 A Flag of Truce

Cornwallis at once sent a flag of truce with a request for a cessation of hostilities and the appointment of two officers on each side "to meet at Mr. Moore's house to settle terms for the surrender." Washington granted two hours for the submission of proposals in writing; in the afternoon, the proposals were received and the flag returned with the ultimatum of the American commander; the ultimatum was accepted and the commissioners were appointed. The articles of capitulation were drawn up on the eighteenth and signed on the nineteenth. The general conditions of surrender were the same that had been forced on Lincoln at Charleston the year before. The land forces became prisoners of the United States and the naval forces passed into the hands of the king of France. The original document is with the Knox manuscripts deposited with the New England Historic-Genealogical Society at Boston.

Moore House at Yorktown

The Surrender of Cornwallis

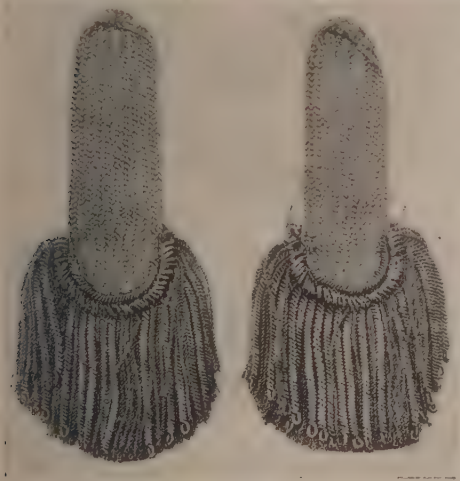

The ceremony of capitulation took place on the same day. At noon, one redout was delivered to the French grenadiers and another to the American infantry; at one o'clock, the Gloucester works were given up; at two o'clock, the British garrison at Yorktown marched out as prisoners of war, with new uniforms but with colors cased and drums beating the old English march, The World Turned Upside Down. Along Hampton road between the lines of the allies they marched; on the right were the Americans with the war-worn continentals in front and the worse clad militia in the rear; on the left were the French troops in their bright uniforms and with their plumed and decorated officers and their beautiful banners of white silk embroidered with golden fleurs-de-lis. Knox, Steuben, Lincoln, and Lafayette were there; Rochambeau was there; Washington was there; but Cornwallis was not there. Pleading

1781

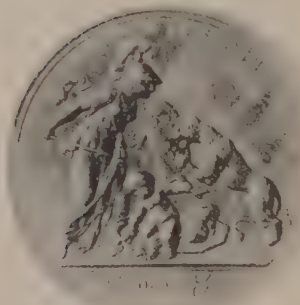

Charles, Earl Cornwallis, Lieutenant-general in the British Army
(Reproduced in reduced facsimile of original painting by Copley, in Guildhall, London)

Epaulets worn by Washington at Yorktown

1781 sickness as his excuse, the British commander sent his sword by General O'Hara to Washington who assigned to General Lincoln the honor of receiving it. Lincoln took the sword in token of Cornwallis's surrender and gave it back in token of Washington's generosity. In a field beyond was a circle of French hussars. Into this circle, each British regiment marched. "Present arms! Lay down arms! Put off swords and cartridge boxes!" And bronzed cheeks were wet with tears. Then back between the double lines, the vanquished veterans marched into the town.

Losses and Trophies

The number of officers, soldiers, and seamen captured during the siege or surrendered was about eight thousand. Most of these were marched to the prison camps at Winchester and Frederick. They were soon removed to York, Pennsylvania, where they remained until the end of the war, after which many of them became American citizens. Among the trophies were seventy-five brass and sixty-nine iron cannons. Eighteen German and six British regimental standards were given up. The British troops outnumbered the Hessians more than two to one, but the colors surrendered were only a third as many; the discrepancy calls to mind the abduction of the British flags after Burgoyne's surrender at Saratoga. The total British loss of men during the siege was five hundred and eighty-two killed and wounded and seventy missing. On the other side, the loss in killed and wounded was one hundred and eighty-six for the French and eighty-eight for the Americans.

Medal issued by Congress to Commemorate the Surrender of the British at Saratoga and Yorktown

General Joy

Lieutenant-colonel Tilghman of Washington's staff bore the glad news northward as fast as horse could travel.

ANSBACH-BAYREUTH COLOR

(This Ansbach-Bayreuth flag is one of three surrendered at Yorktown and preserved to this day. It now hangs in the chapel of the United States Military Academy at West Point. The illustration shows its present appearance. Mr. Gherardi Davis, in his Regimental Colors in the War of the Revolution (limited edition, privately printed, 1907), gives illustrations and detailed description of all of these)

SURRENDER OF CORNWALLIS AT YORKTOWN

(Close facsimile of the original picture painted by John Trumbull in 1787. It is now in the Trumbull Gallery, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut)

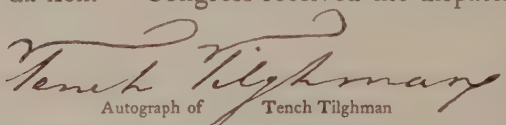

1781 He reached Philadelphia after midnight of the twenty-fourth and the city watchman proclaimed the tremendous

Colonel Peter Gansevoort's Third New York Regiment Flag, made in 1778 or 1779 and carried at the Siege of Yorktown

(Reproduced from a carefully colored photograph of this flag by courteous permission of Mrs. Abraham Gansevoort Lansing, of Albany, N. Y.)

tidings. "Basht dree o'glock, und Gorn-wal-lis isht da-ken." Congress received the dispatches in the morning and attended prayers at the Lutheran church in the afternoon. In the evening, the day's rejoicings were ended by a grand illumination of the city. Heath's army in the Highlands gave almost a week to celebrations and camp banquets with "continental menu." Harvard and Yale glowed with bonfires, orations, and triumphal hymns. The whole country bathed in joy, for peace and independence were in sight. Congress ordered "that there should be a marble monument erected at Yorktown to commemorate the alliance between France and the United States and the victory achieved by their associated arms." In 1796, an impatient and unphilosophic Frenchman wrote: "It is not even yet begun.

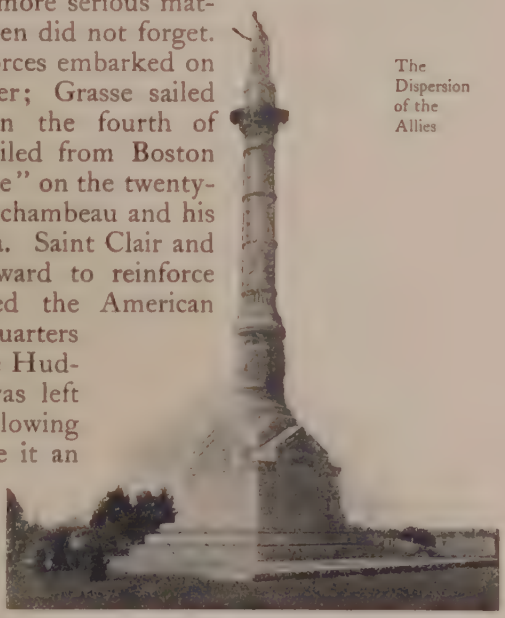

Autograph of Tench Tilghman

. . . Such negligence is inconceivable, shameful, and unaccountable." The Revolutionary generation of Americans had on hand more serious matters, but their grandchildren did not forget. 1781 1782

The Dispersion of the Allies

Saint Simon and his forces embarked on the thirty-first of October; Grasse sailed for the West Indies on the fourth of November; Lafayette sailed from Boston for France in the "Alliance" on the twenty-second of December; Rochambeau and his army remained in Virginia. Saint Clair and Wayne were sent southward to reinforce Greene, and Lincoln led the American main army into winter quarters in New Jersey and on the Hudson. Thus Yorktown was left almost alone. In the following century, another war gave it an ephemeral importance after which it again dropped into rustic obscurity. "In fact, it seems to be the lot of Yorktown that, the more it becomes a historical spot, the less it becomes anything else."

Yorktown Monument

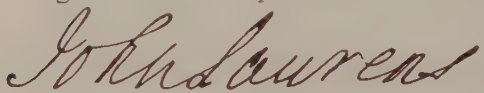

Greene after Yorktown

After the battle of Eutaw Springs, General Greene had retired with his army to the High Hills of the Santee. He had been roughly handled, but after the arrival of reinforcements that Washington sent, he again took the offensive. On the nineteenth of November, he abandoned the High Hills and advanced to the Edisto between Charleston (where the British were) and Jacksonboro (where the South Carolina legislature was). In February, 1782, he sent Wayne into Georgia and the British retired to Savannah. The condition of Greene's troops became deplorable; many of them could not leave their tents for want of clothes. Their privations made them bitter even to the edge of mutiny while the 1782 seizure of necessary supplies so irritated the people that they were almost ready to fight with those who had been fighting for them. The situation demanded great tact and some severity on the part of the commanding general.

The End of Military Operations in the South

The British had evacuated Wilmington in January, 1782, and, on the eleventh of July, they took their leave of Savannah carrying not fewer than five thousand negroes with them. On the seventh of August, General Leslie announced that the evacuation of Charleston had been determined on. Greene declined Leslie's proposition for a cessation of hostilities and his offer to pay for provisions that might be brought into Charleston. Then Leslie tried to seize what he was not permitted to buy. One of his foraging parties, led by Lieutenant-colonel Benjamin Thompson (a native of Woburn, Massachusetts, and later well known in the scientific world as Count Rumford), surprised and dispersed Marion's brigade while that partisan chief was in attendance at the legislature. The younger Laurens who had "winged" General Charles Lee in a duel was killed in a skirmish with one of these foraging parties at Combahee Ferry. In the guerrilla warfare that was kept up in some parts of the South, the irate Whigs exacted a fearful vengeance of the Tories. On the fourteenth of December, Charleston was evacuated and Greene marched into the city at the head of his army. Three days later, the last British ship passed the bar. The whole South was now free from British domination. To the victors of King's Mountain and the Cowpens, to the strategical genius and untiring labors of Greene, and to Marion, Sumter, Pickens, and other partisan leaders and their followers belongs the credit for the redemption of the South.

Autograph of John Laurens

August 27

Appreciation of Greene

It is impossible to say what General Greene might have done with more ample resources, but his campaigns have been pronounced comparable with the best work of Turenne or Wellington, and Alexander Hamilton said that his qualifications for statesmanship were not less remarkable than his military ability. Congress marked its appreciation of his brilliant conduct by a gold medal and a vote of thanks, South Carolina voted him ten thousand guineas, Georgia gave him the confiscated plantation of Lieutenant-governor John Graham, and North Carolina made a grant of wild lands. In the summer of 1783, when his army had been disbanded, he journeyed homeward and was greeted at Philadelphia by congress and everywhere by an enthusiastic people. His estate had been seriously impaired by the war and he was burdened with pecuniary responsibilities incurred through the dishonesty of an army contractor for whom he had become security. In 1785, he removed to his Georgia plantation at Mulberry Grove, a few miles from Savannah, where his death was soon caused by a sunstroke. On the following day, the body was taken to Savannah and placed in one of several similar vaults in the old cemetery. Later, there were stories of removal, and, for a century, the exact resting-place of the remains was a matter of much mystery. In 1900, the Rhode Island society of the Cincinnati appropriated money to cover the expenses and appointed Colonel Asa Bird Gardiner a committee to direct a search that proved successful. The corroded coffin-plate, being subjected to careful scientific and photographic treatment, gave up the following inscription:

1782
1783

Greene's Monument at Savannah

NATHANAEL GREENE
Obit June 19 1786
Æ 44 years

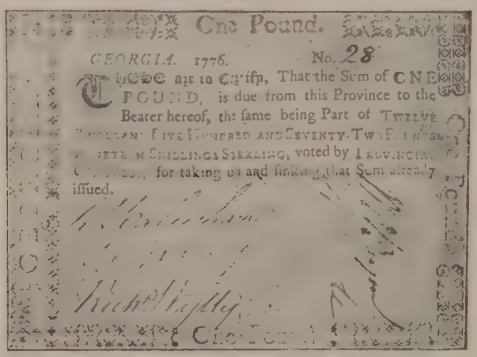

CHAPTER XV

THE SINEWS OF WAR

Continental Financiering

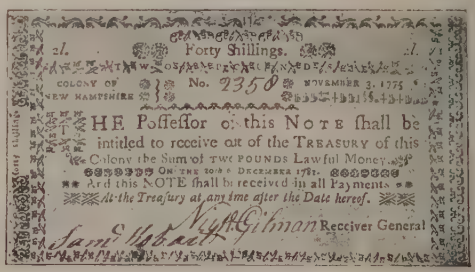

THE colonies had little surplus capital and the continental congress had no coercive power. It could apportion loans and taxes, resolve, implore, and promise—little more. As the war went on, congress sought the necessary financial support in four different ways: bills of credit, requisitions upon the states, loans, and taxation. The total result was far from being satisfactory.

Georgia Currency of 1776

Bills of Credit

When congress, in 1775, began to issue bills of credit, as recorded in the preceding volume, it was intended that the amount should be small, but paper was comparatively cheap and printers were reasonably plentiful. An issue of six million dollars was authorized in 1775; nineteen millions in 1776; thirteen millions in 1777; sixty-three millions in 1778; and one hundred and forty millions in 1779. The volume of paper currency afloat was increased by state issues of more than two hundred million dollars, of which more than half was authorized by Virginia. Furthermore, the notes were counterfeited on a large scale, not only by undesirable citizens of American birth but also by the British who deliberately engaged in the work. Depreciation was inevitable; congressional resolutions and state legislation were tried in vain; every additional note lessened the current value of each of its predecessors. By January, 1779, it required eight dollars in bills to buy one dollar in specie; by December, the ratio was forty. Washington scarcely exaggerated when he wrote to John Jay "that a wagon-load of money will scarcely purchase a wagon-load of provisions."

New Hampshire Currency of 1775

1775 $209,524,776 1780

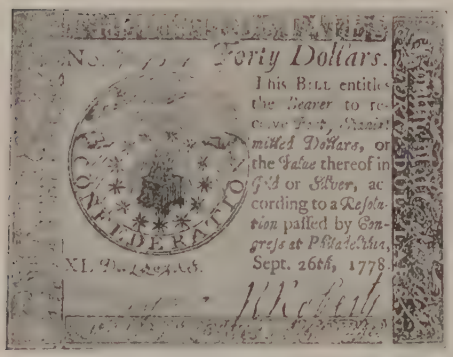

Thirty-dollar Bill of 1775

Genuine and Counterfeit Continental Bill
(From Harper's Magazine)

1780 Congress was slow to admit that its money had depre-
1781 ciated, but finally, in March, 1780, it publicly acknowl-
New Tenor Notes edged the fact and fixed the ratio between paper and specie at forty. It also asked the states to pay in fifteen million dollars a month in the old bills for thirteen months; the bills thus received were to be destroyed and replaced with new tenor notes to an amount not to exceed one-twentieth of the face value of the former issue. About one hundred and nineteen million dollars in the old notes were turned in and canceled but only four million four hundred thousand dollars in the new tenor notes were issued.

Not Worth a Continental

Continental Currency of 1778

Meanwhile, the old tenor bills depreciated more rapidly than ever. In October, 1780, Indian corn at Boston cost one hundred and fifty dollars a bushel; and a barrel of flour, fifteen hundred and seventy-five dollars; even the impecunious Samuel Adams paid two thousand dollars for a suit of clothes and a hat. By January, 1781, it was difficult to pass the bills at any discount; by May, they had practically ceased to circulate, though for a time they were bought and sold as a speculation at prices as low as a thousand to one or even lower. Barbers' shops were papered with the bills, sailors turned loss into frolic by parading the streets in clothes made of the printed paper, and a Philadelphia wag smeared his dog with tar and blanketed him with the worthless bills. 1776–1783

The still-enduring phrase, "not worth a continental," is an embalmed fragment of the early financial history of the United States.

Requisitions

In November, 1777, congress began making requisitions upon the states for the support of the central government, the amount asked from each being roughly apportioned to the population. Requisition followed requisition, but the states were lax in payment and prolific of excuses. Up to the sixth of October, 1779, the requisitions amounted to ninety-five million dollars and yielded fifty-four million dollars in paper worth less than two million dollars in specie. From that time, the requisitions yielded about three million dollars in specie. In 1780, congress inaugurated a policy of asking for specific articles, such as pork, beef, flour, salt, hay, corn, and rum; even these were not furnished with regularity.

Domestic and Forced Loans

Congress found it almost as difficult to obtain money on domestic loans as to maintain the par value of its notes. The total subscriptions to these loans probably did not amount to eleven million dollars. Payment of interest was very uncertain and, after the first of March, 1782, was made in certificates of indebtedness. So great were the needs of the army that the impressment of horses, wagons, and supplies was frequently resorted to, certificates of value being given in exchange. The exact amount of these certificates will never be known. In 1790, Hamilton, then secretary of the treasury, estimated the amount outstanding at more than sixteen million dollars.

Foreign Loans

Whenever possible, money was borrowed abroad. The secret assistance rendered by France through Beaumarchais has already been mentioned. After she entered the conflict openly, subsidies amounting to nearly two million dollars were granted and more than six million dollars was loaned. More than a million dollars was obtained in Holland and a little in Spain. Most of these loans were made only after great persistence. There is abundant evidence that our allies thought the 1776 1783 Americans unduly eager to shift the financial burden of the war to their shoulders. Congress even drew bills upon its foreign agents simply hoping that they would find some way in which to meet them. Some of these bills went to protest.

Taxes

As explained in an earlier chapter, the continental congress had no effective power of taxation and the articles of confederation did not make the matter much better. The several states had the exclusive power of levying taxes; even tariff taxes were under state control. In 1781, congress proposed a duty of five per cent. upon imports, but Rhode Island persisted in her opposition and killed the project. In 1783, there was a proposal of specific duties on certain classes of goods and ad valorem duties on other imported commodities, the revenue to be used in payment of the interest on the public debt, but New York would not give the consent that was necessary.

Mercantile Ventures and Lottery

Among the other devices tried by congress for raising money were the buying and sending abroad of cargoes of tobacco and other products and even the creation of a lottery. Lotteries were then regarded as legitimate; there are New England churches standing today that were partly built with funds raised in this manner. As the government's lottery tickets were sold for specie only and the prizes were payable in treasury bank-notes, or in certificates payable in five years with interest at four per cent., the public did not become very enthusiastic and little money was realized from the undertaking.

Robert Morris

February 20, 1781

For a time, the finances of the country were managed by congressional committees and boards of control, but this administrative machinery proved so weak and ineffective that power was concentrated and Robert Morris was appointed superintendent of finance. This remarkable man, a native of Liverpool, had come to America in 1747 and was now one of the merchant princes of Philadelphia. He was a member of both the first and the second continental congresses and was a signer of the declaration of independence. After the flight of congress from Philadelphia in December, 1776, he was appointed one of the committee of three that exercised authority there. He rendered important financial assistance during Washington's glorious winter campaign in the Jerseys, and during most of the war acted as the chief fiscal agent of the government. After becoming superintendent, he established the Bank of North America to assist the government in its financial operations. He labored strenuously to obtain money and supplies and, in critical emergencies, contributed freely from his own resources. He endeavored to abolish complicated business methods and corrupt financial administration and to awaken the people to the needs of the government. But he found that the effort to arouse the patriotic conscience of the legislatures was "like preaching to the dead." 1776 1783

Rochambeau's Little Loan

A good idea of the shifts to which Morris was sometimes obliged to resort may be obtained from an incident of the Yorktown campaign. The proposed expedition was somewhat disagreeable to the northern troops and Washington wrote to the superintendent that "a douceur of a little hard money would put them in a proper temper." Morris had already had great difficulty in obtaining supplies for the project and could think of no source from which the money could be obtained except Rochambeau, the French commander. Accordingly, he cultivated the good will of the French minister, entertained Rochambeau in Philadelphia on his way southward, and, on the fifth of September, 1781, asked him for a loan of twenty thousand dollars until the first of October. Rochambeau finally provided the money, but when the first of October came, Morris was unable to repay the loan and was obliged to ask for an extension of time. He was not able to repay even a part of the debt until the middle of November.

The Total Money Cost

The cost of the Revolution to the central government has been variously estimated, but it was probably in the neighborhood of eighty-two million dollars, specie value. In addition, the states probably expended eighteen or twenty million dollars more, some of which 1776 1783 came from the confiscated estates of Tories. Of the eighty-two millions, about thirty-eight millions represented the continental currency; about eight millions came from foreign subsidies and loans; about eleven and a half millions from domestic loans; the certificates of indebtedness aggregated about sixteen and a half millions; the rest was obtained from the states and from various other sources. The exact total cost can never be known; Jefferson estimated it as high as one hundred and forty million dollars. At the end of the war, the unpaid debt was, probably, not far from forty-two million dollars. This sum seems small to a people who have easily carried a war debt of three thousand million dollars and who pay two hundred million dollars in 1908 one year for their postal service, but it was simply appalling to the Americans of that day. They had no one who could divide his estate and pay the forty-two millions with the moiety and there were many who really thought that the debt never could be paid.

CHAPTER XVI

THE TORIES IN WAR TIME

American Tories

THAT the Revolutionary struggle lasted as long as it did and that it gave rise to so many excesses was largely due to the existence of a party that remained loyal to the king. This was so well understood by the patriots that no epithets were too strong to express their hatred and scorn for the loyalists—"friends of government" they called themselves. Even Washington did not measure words when referring to "the enemies of the liberties of their country." In a letter describing the plight of the thousand Tories whom Howe took away from Boston he said that "one or two have done what a great number ought to have done long ago—committed suicide."

1776

Reparation

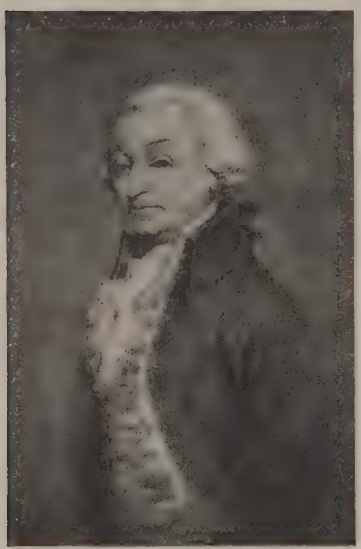

It is difficult for many, even now, to look at the question as one that has a second side. But not all of the loyalists were despicable and unprincipled, and not all of the patriots were magnanimous and heroic. Between the bad and the good were others of "every grade of respectability and of every shade of moral meanness." We do not find it necessary to question the intelligence, respectability, public virtue, and moral worth of the exiled Saltonstalls, Sewalls, and Winslows, men who believed that calm remonstrance would right all wrongs and whose loyalty was based on dread of anarchy and reverence for constitutional order.

Paine's Classification

Thomas Paine classified the Tories as "Interested men, who were not to be trusted. Weak men, who cannot see. Prejudiced men, who will not see. A certain set of moderate men, who think better of the European world than it deserves." Among the "interested men" were the crown officials whose incomes were in danger and whose loyalty was, in many cases, strengthened by official oaths. Others of this class were merchants who were injured by non-importation agreements and saw their profitable business ruined by disorder. In New England and New York and, in a less degree, in Maryland, the marked loyalty of the Anglican clergy and their parishioners added sectarian bitterness to partisan rancor. Of course, believers in the divine right of kings were Tories, as were those who felt that parliament had a right to tax the colonies. In general, those who were well endowed with the world's goods were inclined to hold aloof from the patriot cause. In some colonies, factional struggles determined the alignment of families and parties. In New York, for example, the DeLancey party was loyal partly because the Livingston party was not. In all the colonies, many were Tories because they were convinced that the patriot cause was foredoomed to failure; they had no desire to risk their property and heads in a losing cause. There were also many vicars of Bray, Tories or Whigs according to the varying fortunes of the war. Others who sympathized with resistance to oppression drew back from independence with its unknown dangers as from the brink of a precipice.

1775 1783

Thomas Jones, of New York, a Prominent Loyalist

1775
1783

Quack Prescriptions

The patriots realized their danger from the loyalists and used all sorts of methods to convert them or to make them harmless. As the conflict grew more heated, wordy abuse and social ostracism developed into physical violence and destruction of property. Coaches were burned, goods were destroyed or stolen, effigies were hung, while, in all the rebellious colonies, tar and feathers became the accepted antidote for Toryism. Private spite often played its part, though the object usually avowed was the conversion of the Tory. As Doctor Ellis says, "the ordeal oftener failed than succeeded in making patriots."

Systematic Treatment

At the beginning of the war, General Gage had proclaimed that all who assisted the insurgents or corresponded with them should be treated as rebels, and the Massachusetts legislature, with equal resolution, declared that all who aided the officers of the British government should be held guilty of high treason. In times of peace, "he that is not against us is for us," but, in times of war, "he that is not for us is against us." Thus it came to pass that tolerant forbearance went out of the colonies and even free speech was suppressed. At first, the persecution was largely the work of mere mobs; then the work was taken up more systematically by the revolutionary committees. "The committees sent Patriot newspapers and other propaganda to the wavering or obstinate, but seldom failed to follow this system of conversion with a personal interview if the literature failed. When the political sentiment of a whole community was in doubt, special committees, or in some cases clergymen of Whig views, were appointed to confer with the inhabitants upon the subject of American freedom."

Tory Prisoners

The Tory who lived in territory controlled by the American forces was lucky if he suffered nothing worse than a political quarantine in his own house or yard. Hundreds were imprisoned along with common thieves and murderers, and not a few realized the horrors of the underground prison at Simsbury. Often Tories were exiled to places where they could not give aid and com-1775 1783 fort to the enemy; practically whole communities were thus removed into sister states. Something resembling "reconcentration camps" were occasionally established and the management thereof put into the hands of coarse and brutal men who ill-treated the prisoners.

Refugees

The lot of those who escaped to the British lines was often not much more enviable. As a general thing, they took with them but little money and that was soon spent. Many were reduced to abject want. In the summer of 1778, Sir Henry Clinton wrote that nothing was more distressing to him than the applications he hourly received from refugees. Some relief was rendered by the British government and thousands entered the civil or the military service of the king. Those who went to England suffered perhaps even more than those who remained in America, though a few prospered and rose to high station. They ranged "all the way from Governor Penn who had lost a province down to a tide-waiter who had been robed in a suit of tar and feathers," and the eyes of all were fixed upon the treasury. In his History of England, Massey says that their claims "were undeniable, but they were claims upon Great Britain, not upon the American States." The majority found London to be a "sad lickpenny" where, one of them declared, they "could not breathe the vital air without heavy expense."

Their Legal Status

As early as the spring of 1776, the continental congress recommended that the colonies should disarm persons "notoriously disaffected to the cause of America." Connecticut had already made it an offense subject to fine, imprisonment, or disfranchisement to libel or to defame congress or the acts of the assembly. Other states followed with similar harsh enactments. In five states, loyalists were directly disfranchised or rendered ineligible for office. Members of the proscribed class were denied recourse to the courts of law; they could not even buy or sell land or make a will. Lawyers who refused to take the oath of allegiance were not permitted to practice in courts and, in Pennsylvania, persons refusing the oath were forbidden to act as professors, masters, tutors, or schoolmasters. Imprisonment or death was the punishment for affirming the king's authority; "no word was tolerated against the raising of a Continental army, and not a whisper derogatory to Continental money." In eight states, prominent Tories were formally banished while, in others, the same end was attained by some other form of legal effect or by "a good and wholesome law of tar and feathers." Early in 1777, every state except South Carolina and Georgia attainted "divers traitors," and "traitor" meant any one who adhered to the king. In Pennsylvania the "black list" contained the names of four hundred and ninety persons, most of whom left Philadelphia with the British; some of those who fell into American hands were convicted and executed. 1775 1783

Property, Plunder, and Confiscation

Many of the Tories were persons of wealth upon whose property the Whigs cast covetous eyes. Their personal property was often raffled off by the town authorities and the militia plundered without ceremony. "Horses, cows, poultry, and every movable possession of a Tory became regarded as contraband of war." Men tried for theft found "that the act was condoned if the victim had been mistaken for a Tory, and altogether excused if actually shown to be of that political persuasion." In time, the idea developed that the estates of Tories should be confiscated to furnish funds to carry on the war and, late in 1777, congress advised the states to adopt such a policy. In spite of rampant corruption, great sums came into the state treasuries. In New York alone, more than three and a half million dollars' worth of property was thus seized and much more escaped only by reason of the fact that it lay in or about New York City, or on Long Island or Staten Island where the British remained in control until the zeal for confiscation had somewhat abated.

Political Inactivity

Had all who openly or secretly sided with the king exerted themselves as vigorously for him as the patriots did against him, the task of putting down the revolt

1775 1783 would have been easy. But the loyalists lacked organization and initiative. Instead of taking part in colonial politics, they looked on and frowned. Had they shown real activity, they might have blocked the choice of delegates to the continental congress as, indeed, they did in a few places. Then and there, they lost their last political opportunity. After the declaration of independence, "every Tory was an enemy in camp, a suspected traitor and a wretch to be charged with all the ills of the state." Loyalty to the king had become treason to the country.

In New York

With Howe's capture of New York, that city became a haven of refuge for the persecuted; the mass of fugitives constantly grew in size and in hopeless dependence upon British charity. Some of the more influential obtained dignified employment in the civil service. Many of the others would gladly have taken up arms, but it was several years before the British officers recognized the value of the loyalists as provincial militia. "The expectation that the hour of complete victory was imminent acted also to prevent the early enlistment of the Loyalists, because there was no wish to embitter their relations with the 'rebels' with whom they would soon return to live."

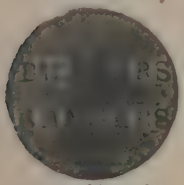

Tory Troops

Even when the war had actually begun, the tendency of the Tories was to rely upon the king's troops to put down the rebellion and to protect them in their rights, rather than to act vigorously themselves. This tendency was as natural for them then as it is for law-abiding citizens today to look to the constituted authorities for the repression of mob violence. Still, there were some attempts to assist the British troops. At the very beginning of hostilities, two hundred Tory merchants and traders in Boston volunteered their services and were enrolled. Later, three companies of Loyal American Associators were formed in Boston, as were a company of Loyal Irish Volunteers and a company known as the Royal Fencible Americans. About the time that Howe was driven from Boston, the loyalists of North Carolina were rising; as already told, they were dispersed at the battle of Moore's Creek Bridge. In the first year of the war, the loyalists also displayed some activity in Virginia, Maryland, New Jersey, and in New York where a regiment of Scotch refugees and old soldiers was raised by Allan McLean and Guy Johnson and hurried into Canada. 1775 1783

The Loyalist Militia

Early in 1776, Sir John Johnson organized fugitive loyalists and hung on the northern frontier of New York. In the year following, Johnson's "Loyal Greens" and Butler's "Tory Rangers" served under Saint Leger and fought in the battle of Oriskany. Later, they ravaged the frontier and wrought fearful havoc in the Wyoming, Cherry, and Mohawk valleys. After Howe at New York had decided to enlist Tories, Tryon, the exiled governor, was appointed major-general of provincial forces and began the work of recruiting. In 1777, Edmund Fanning, Tryon's son-in-law, organized "The King's American Regiment" of which he became the commander. Early in 1779, concessions as to the rank of provincial officers on service with regular troops were made and it was provided that those who were wounded should receive the same gratuity as officers of the regular army. It is said that the number of loyalist troops mustered on one occasion exceeded that of Washington's whole army. To this loyalist militia were left the small expeditions to burn and pillage towns, petty attacks that aroused the virulent hatred of the patriots. Tryon's expedition against Fairfield, Norwalk, and New Haven, in 1779, was one of their undertakings. In 1780, the

Button of Butler's Rangers
(From collection of W. L. Calver)

Cross-belt Plate of Butler's Rangers, found at Fort George, Canada, opposite Fort Niagara, New York
(From collection of W. L. Calver)

Button of the King's American Regiment
(From collection of W. L. Calver)

1775 1783 loyalists were so numerous in New York that they were encouraged by the British government to form an association of their own independent of the British commander. Thus, William, the son of Benjamin Franklin and lately the Tory governor of New Jersey, became the head of "The Honorable Board of Associated Loyalists." The three bands organized by the "Honorable Board" were armed at the expense of Great Britain, but its members fed and clothed themselves by plundering the rebels of Connecticut, Long Island, and New Jersey. By way of retaliation, similar "Commissions" were issued by the rebels. The freebooters on both sides quickly established amicable relations and carried on their work with little difference in methods or morals.

Sympathetic Service

Other loyalists found employment as spies or were sent to proselyte among their old friends and neighbors. Washington frequently denounced their "diabolical and insidious arts and schemes." Congress advised the states to seize all suspected British emissaries who were scattered through the country "under various pretenses of amusement and business, whereby they are enabled to spread disaffection, intimidate the people by false news, and depreciate the currency of the United States." Tories who had remained at home were also of service to the British, furnishing information, stealing powder and salt, supplying provisions and horses, distributing proclamations, and depreciating the continental currency both by refusing to accept it and by spreading counterfeits. More than once the local militia, when sorely needed at the front, were kept at home by fear of a fire in the rear, a Tory insurrection.

Tory Privateers

Yielding to the importunities of Tryon, the British government began, in 1779, to issue letters of marque and reprisal; in a short time, alluring broadsides urged the refugees to call at some named rendezvous and there "learn the advantages of this or that superb and elegant ship." A station at Lloyd's Neck was assigned to the fleet of associated loyalists and thence they made attacks along the whole New England coast. "So many of these marauding ventures went forth under the cover of night that 'owls and ghosts, and thieves and Tories' came to be clearly associated in the Whig minds." 1775-1783

The Southern Tories

In the opinion of Professor Van Tyne, fifty thousand loyalists were drawn into the military service of Great Britain. Practically all the frontier warfare was carried on by Tory bands in league with Indians, a warfare that did not much exceed in bloodthirstiness the conflict between Whig and Tory in the South where the war was largely a conflict between neighbor and neighbor and replete with brutal outrage and murder in which neither party can be fairly said to have surpassed the other. In the warfare that followed the capture of Charleston, Tarleton's "Loyal Legion," raised in New York, played a prominent part, and Simcoe's "Queen's Rangers" made a reputation that has not yet faded away. There were nearly two thousand four hundred Tories in the army that defeated Gates at Camden. All of Ferguson's force at King's Mountain were loyalists and the army with which Arnold raided Virginia was composed chiefly of loyalists enlisted in New York. After the great victory at Yorktown, partisan warfare continued in the debatable region around a few posts like New York and Charleston until news came "that a treaty of peace was being negotiated, accompanied by the fearful rumor that the Loyalists were to be abandoned to their fate." How that fate was shaped after the coming of peace will be told in a later chapter.

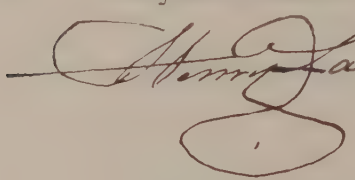

CHAPTER XVII

PEACE

The American Commissioners

AS early as September, 1779, John Adams had been empowered to negotiate a peace; in June, 1781, congress named four additional commissioners, Benjamin Franklin, John Jay, Henry Laurens, and Thomas Jefferson. Their instructions contained two positive conditions, independence and the preservation of the treaties with France, and they were required "to make the most candid and confidential communications upon all subjects to the ministers of our generous ally, the king of France; to undertake nothing in negotiations for peace or truce without their knowledge or concurrence; and ultimately to govern yourselves by their advice and opinion." Herein appears the hand of Luzerne, the French minister to the United States, but, as we shall see, the bonds did not bind. For a time, Franklin was alone at Paris where the negotiations were carried on; Adams was in Holland, Laurens was a prisoner in England, Jay was in Spain, and Jefferson declined the appointment. In June, 1782, Jay joined Franklin who had written: "Spain has taken four years to consider whether she should treat with us or not. Give her forty, and let us in the meantime mind our own business."

Autograph of Henry Laurens

June 23

Tidings of Yorktown reached London on Sunday, the twenty-fifth of November. The Whigs were delighted; the king and ministry were overwhelmed. Lord North received the news "as he would have taken a ball in his breast" and paced up and down the apartment exclaiming wildly, "Oh God! it is all over!" Germain sent a

1781 London Gets the News

John Jay, John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, Henry Laurens, Temple Franklin

The American Peace Commission of 1782

(Facsimile reproduction of Benjamin West's unfinished painting owned by Lord Belper of Kingston Hall, Kegworth, Derby, England. Copyright, 1909, by The Burrows Brothers Company) dispatch to the king at Kew and the king sent back an answer by the same messenger. "The king writes," said Lord George, "just as he always does, except that I observe he has omitted to mark the hour and the minute of his writing, with his usual precision."

The king well knew that to assent to any peace that would acknowledge American independence would mean the downfall of the system of personal government that

Lord North Resigns

1782 he had reared with great trouble. Parliament continued for some months to support the king and ministry, but the pressure of public opinion gradually undermined their majority. On the twenty-third of February, 1782, the commons rejected by only one vote Conway's motion to petition the king to end the American war. A few days later, the ministry lost a motion to adjourn and found it expedient to accept a pending motion declaring against the further prosecution of offensive war in America. On the fifth of March, a bill was passed enabling the king to make a peace or truce. Lord North resigned on the twentieth of March, 1782, "a day of good omen for men of English race on both sides of the Atlantic."

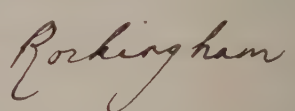

Freedom for a Race

Lord North's fall marked a revolution in English politics. With him went all purpose of conquering America and all hope of maintaining the personal and arbitrary government of George III. That England has popular government today is due in no small measure to the American patriots. "The decisive battle of freedom in England, as well as in America, and in that vast colonial world for which Chatham prophesied the dominion of the future, had now been fought and won."

The Rockingham Ministry

March 22

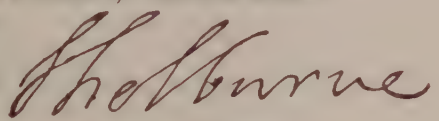

After threatening to retire to Hanover and making overtures to other leaders, the king accepted the marquis of Rockingham, the influential leader of the Old Whig aristocracy, as the head of a new cabinet with Shelburne and Fox as the principal secretaries of state. Of all the experiences of George III., this was, perhaps, the bitterest. North is said to have remarked that he had often been accused of issuing false bulletins, but he had never issued one so false as that in which he announced the entrance of the new ministry into power; in introducing the name of each member, the bulletin used the words, "His Majesty has been pleased to appoint."

Autograph of Rockingham

Rockingham took office upon condition that the independence of the United States should be acknowledged. As secretary for the colonies, Shelburne claimed that the negotiations pertained to his department, while Fox, the secretary for foreign affairs, claimed that they should be conducted by himself. Shelburne and Fox were politically and personally hostile, but Shelburne and Franklin were warm friends. In March, Franklin wrote to Shelburne expressing a hope for the restoration of peace, and Shelburne sent Richard Oswald over to Paris as his personal representative to ascertain informally on what terms the Americans would make peace. Oswald was a retired Scotch merchant with no diplomatic experience, but a "very honest and sensible man." The wrangling of the secretaries was finally compromised by continuing Oswald as Shelburne's representative with Franklin and by sending Thomas Grenville, the son of the author of the stamp act, as Fox's negotiator with Vergennes.

1782 Peace Negotiations Begun

Autograph of Shelburne

In April, 1782, Franklin had several informal interviews with Oswald concerning "necessary" and "advisable" terms of peace with England, the memoranda of which Franklin put in writing. With these notes and a letter from Franklin to Shelburne, Oswald returned to London. In these first proposals, Franklin asked for American independence as a step toward "reconciliation" and that England should make "reparation" for the destruction of villages and towns; with refreshing courage he also suggested that England should, of her own accord, give up Canada and Nova Scotia, thus making it possible to indemnify Americans for their losses of private property in the war and to repay the Tories for their confiscated estates.

Franklin's First Proposals

On the twenty-third of April, the cabinet decided to send word by Oswald that Great Britain would grant American independence in return for a peace on the basis of the treaty of 1763; Grenville was to make a

The British Answer

1782 similar statement to Vergennes. Shelburne also told Oswald to inform Franklin that reparation was not to be thought of, that England must hold to the Penobscot River, that the debts owed by Americans to British subjects must be secured, that the loyalists must be restored to a full enjoyment of their rights, that compensation would be expected for the surrender of New York, Charleston, and Savannah which were then held by the British, and that, if America was to be independent, she must really be so—there must be no "secret, tacit, or ostensible connection with France." As to Franklin and Shelburne, each shrewd bargainer had begun by setting his terms high. As to Vergennes, the May 8 proposition borne to him by Grenville caused a smile. The granting of an independence that was already assured was scant compensation for the sacrifices that France had made. The French minister had no idea of giving up the West India Islands that France had taken from England and was then eagerly expecting word that Jamaica also had been won; when word from the West Indies came, it did not have the expected flavor. As to the recognition of independence, England must treat directly with America. Grenville was disappointed, but the British ministry took Vergennes at his word—literally.

An Offer of Independence

After his interview with Vergennes, Grenville had a talk with Franklin and then suggested to Fox that it might be well to grant independence in the first place "instead of making it a conditional article of general treaty." On the twelfth of April, Rodney had defeated the French fleet in the West Indies and captured Grasse, its commander, but the story had not been told on either side of the English Channel when Vergennes returned the haughty answer just recorded. A few days later,
May 18 news of the victory was received at London and the city went wild in a Britannia-rules-the-wave sort of jubilee. On the twenty-third of May, the cabinet determined to propose the independence of America "in the first instance" as Grenville had suggested, but the king and Shelburne wanted to set a price on the grant and seemed to think that a compromise was still possible. At Paris, was Grenville with authority to treat only with France, and Oswald with credentials only to Franklin. Without an enabling act, Oswald could not treat at all, for British subjects were prohibited from entering into negotiations with the revolted colonies. But both agents could talk informally with Franklin to whom Grenville explained that the defect of his commission was purely accidental. This gave color to Vergennes's insinuations of British bad faith and aroused Franklin's suspicions of an attempt to separate the allies. 1782

The End of the Rockingham Ministry

While Grenville's attempt to negotiate with Franklin as well as with Vergennes aroused in the French ministry a suspicion of foul play, Fox's angry attitude was on the eve of breaking up the British cabinet. When the enabling act was passed by parliament and the cabinet decided to appoint Oswald as a separate commissioner and voted down Fox's motion for an unconditional acknowledgment of the independence of the United States, Fox announced that he should resign his office. On the following day, Rockingham died. Weak and short-lived as his ministry had been, it had done good work. In spite of its bickerings and jealousies, it is probable that, during that spring, more was done toward purifying political life in England than had been done since the expulsion of the Stuarts and, in spite of the king, the movement for making peace with America was so strengthened that it could not be stayed. July 1

Shelburne Becomes Prime Minister

In the earl of Shelburne the king had recognized the safest of the Whigs and through him he had habitually communicated with the Rockingham cabinet. When Rockingham died, Fox resigned and Shelburne became prime minister. Burke and others whom the king described as "leaders of sedition" dropped out of the cabinet and the younger Pitt became chancellor of the exchequer. The two sections of the Whig party drifted further apart and, amid violent altercations, parliament adjourned on the eleventh of July. Shelburne sent 1782 July 27 word to Oswald that he would be given a new commission "containing full powers to treat and to conclude with instructions from the minister who has succeeded to the department which I lately held, to make the independency of the colonies the basis and preliminary of the treaty now depending." By this time, Grenville had left Paris where he was succeeded by Alleyne Fitzherbert. The situation now was strangely complicated. England was at war with America, France, Spain, and Holland, but willing to make concessions to her rebellious colonies for the sake of thwarting her traditional enemy. Spain was hostile to the United States, and France was bound to both by treaties of alliance. To satisfy America and Spain with their conflicting interests and to gain from both and from the common enemy all that was possible for France was no ordinary task. With such a burden on his shoulders, it would be strange if the line along which Vergennes walked was altogether straight. In the background stood George III., surly and irreconcilable.

Jay's Demand

Early in August, Oswald received his new commission, but Jay, who had joined Franklin in June, objected to it because it spoke of the United States as "colonies or plantations." Franklin thought the commission satisfactory enough and Vergennes, to whom it was submitted, agreed with him. But Jay suspected Vergennes of not desiring the independence of the United States until France and Spain had attained their own ends and insisted that the commission should specifically name the United States and make it clear that Oswald was to treat not with thirteen colonies but with an independent nation. Franklin finally consented and

August 18

Oswald wrote to Shelburne: "The American commissioners will not move a step until independence is acknowledged."

Rayneval's "Personal Ideas"

Early in September, Rayneval, Vergennes's private secretary, submitted to Jay a memoir urging that the Mississippi valley below the thirty-first parallel should be given to Spain, that the territory east of the Mississippi thence to the Ohio should be left to the Indians under American and Spanish protectorates, and that all the territory north of the Ohio should be retained by Great Britain. This would confine the United States between the mountains and the sea. About the same time, the British put into Jay's hands an intercepted letter to Vergennes, in which Marbois, the French secretary of legation at Philadelphia, expressed the belief that the American claims as to territory and the fisheries were extravagant. Having learned that Rayneval had gone to London under an assumed name, Jay jumped to the conclusion that he had gone thither to influence the British cabinet on these points. Convinced that France had conspired with Spain against the United States, Jay sent Benjamin Vaughan, a scholarly Englishman and Shelburne's personal friend, to London. Jay's messenger was the grandson of a Boston merchant and, toward the end of the century, took up his residence in what is now the town of Hallowell in Maine where he spent the remainder of his life. Jay's experience in Spain had enriched his understanding of Bourbon politics; it now appears that Vaughan's mission was the turning-point of the peace negotiations. Shelburne's confidence in the American commissioners was reinforced and Oswald was given a satisfactory commission to treat with "the United States of America." The new commission was in Paris by the twenty-seventh of September and Jay wrote: "Mr. Vaughan greatly merits our acknowledgments." After much hesitation on Franklin's part, the American commissioners went on with the negotiations without consulting France.

1782

September 10

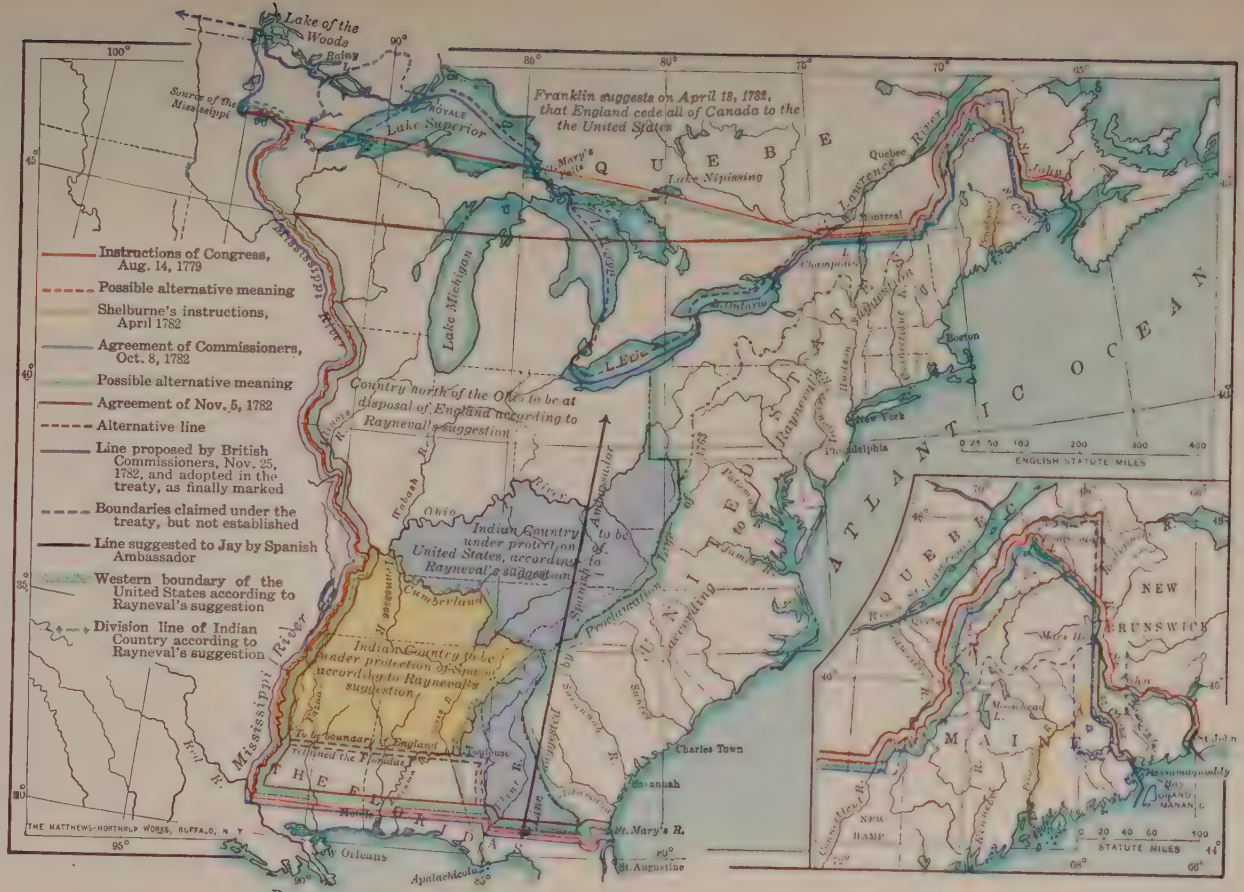

The Attitude of Vergennes

How far Jay's suspicions were correct is still a matter of doubt. The weight of opinion seems to be that Vergennes was not guilty of duplicity and of maliciously plotting against the United States as Jay suspected. In his position, he was obliged to consider the interests of France and Spain as well as those of the United States; as some of these interests clashed, it was inevitable that he should oppose some of the American claims. In

THE BOUNDARY NEGOTIATIONS OF 1782 INTERPRETED ACCORDING TO A CONTEMPORARY MAP

(Simplified from a reduction of Mitchell's Map of 1755)

BOUNDARIES PROPOSED IN THE NEGOTIATIONS OF 1782, BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND ENGLAND, ACCORDING TO A MODERN MAP

(Compiled by David Maydole Matteson, A. M.)

1782 fact, he favored the lowest limit that would stand any chance of being acceptable to the American commissioners or to congress; his system cannot be understood unless we keep in mind his expectation that France was to regain Louisiana. Still, it is probable that by ignoring their instructions and negotiating with England independently of France the American commissioners obtained a more favorable treaty than would otherwise have been possible.

Adams Joins Franklin and Jay

Early in October, the American commissioners submitted the plan of a treaty that Oswald approved and forwarded to England. The ministry thought the draft too liberal in the matter of territory and not liberal enough in the matter of compensating loyalists and repealing the laws against them. Henry Strachey was sent over to aid Oswald and the negotiations were reopened. Up to this time, Adams had been filling Laurens's place as American minister to the Netherlands and there opposing the intrigues of Vergennes with a blunt, Napoleonic diplomacy. By the time that he had made the Netherlanders familiar with American affairs, Rodney's plunder of Saint Eustatius stirred Dutch wrath to fever heat and then came the news of the surrender of Cornwallis. Holland recognized the independence of the United States in April and ratified a treaty of amity and commerce with the new nation early in October—the first successful negotiation since the alliance with France.

October 26

Before the end of the month, Adams joined Franklin and Jay at Paris. The two commissioners had differed as to the degree of confidence that might be reposed in Vergennes and concerning their obligation to obey the congressional instructions that put the future of America at the mercy of France. On Sunday, the twenty-seventh of October, the newly arrived umpire wrote in his diary: "I shall have a delicate, a nice, a critical part to act." Adams had a holy horror of Frenchmen in general and of Vergennes in particular.

The points on which the Americans were most insist-ent were the Mississippi as the western boundary, the free navigation of that river, and the right to participate in the Canadian fisheries. The British commissioners insisted that America be wholly free from France, that British debts be secured, and that the loyalists be restored to their rights. The last two points presented peculiar difficulties because these matters lay within the domain of state powers. Strachey set out from Paris on the fifth of November and was in London on the tenth. On the fourteenth, it was resolved that he should take back to Paris "such a treaty as we can sign" and Shelburne wrote to Oswald that "this country is not reduced to terms of humiliation." Strachey was back at Paris with his new instructions by the twenty-fourth and the commissioners met at Oswald's lodgings on the twenty-fifth. For the final effort, Fitzherbert joined the other negotiators on the twenty-sixth, and Laurens, who had been exchanged for Cornwallis, arrived on the twenty-eighth. The new propositions submitted by Strachey were rejected by the American commissioners and, on the twenty-ninth, a final agreement was made. On the following day, the preliminary treaty was signed by Oswald, Franklin, Jay, Adams, and Laurens and "we all went out to Passy to dine with Dr. Franklin."

1782 The Preliminary Treaty

November 30

The treaty declared itself to be provisional and was not to take effect until England and France agreed upon terms of peace. Thus the American commissioners had kept to the strict letter of their contract as Vergennes had to the strict letter of his; beyond that point, French subtlety had been matched against American shrewdness. So ill-advised was Vergennes as to what was taking place that only a week before the signing of the treaty he had written that "if the negotiations were more advanced, I should use the influence that congress has thought fit to give the king for the purpose of making the American plenipotentiaries more conciliatory." At the same time, the progress of the French negotiations with Great Britain were, with equal reserve, kept from the American commissioners. According to the newly 1782 made agreement, hostilities in America were to cease at once and, upon the completion of the treaty, the British armies and fleets were to be withdrawn from the territory of the republic. On the twentieth of January, 1783, the armistice was declared.

Diamond Cuts Diamond

November 23

Meeting on the Level

In the first of the ten articles of the treaty, "His Brittannic Majesty acknowledges the said United States . . . to be free, sovereign and independent States; that he treats with them as such, and for himself, his heirs and successors, relinquishes all claims to the Government, propriety, and territorial rights of the same and every part thereof." From the very nature of the case, some of these expressions could not be recalled whether the provisional articles ever became a definitive treaty or not. Great Britain had met the United States as an independent community of equal dignity and sovereignty with herself.

Boundaries

The second article fixed generous boundaries for the new nation. Although the British had at first demanded the whole of Maine, ostensibly for its timber but really as a refuge for the Tories, they finally agreed to the Saint Croix as the eastern boundary. From the source of the Saint Croix, the boundary line was to run due north to the Highlands; along the Highlands to the northernmost head of the Connecticut River, thence down along that river to the forty-fifth parallel, thence westward to the Saint Lawrence, and up that river and through the great lakes to the most northwestern point of the Lake of the Woods; and thence west to the Mississippi, the source of which was supposed to be further north than it really is. The Mississippi was to be the western boundary. On the south, the line was to follow the thirty-first parallel from the Mississippi eastward "to the middle of the river Apalachicola or Catahouche; thence along the middle thereof to its junction with the Flint River; thence straight to the head of the St. Mary's River; and thence down along the middle of St. Mary's River to the Atlantic Ocean." A secret article provided that in case England regained West Florida the northern boundary of this province should be a line drawn through the mouth of the Yazoo, that is, about thirty-two degrees and twenty-eight minutes of north latitude. The territory thus secured for the United States was twice as great as that proposed by France. Oswald marked the line in red ink on a map but no provision was made for an actual survey. The language was found to be geographically inaccurate and the map was lost. The disputes that thence arose were not put at rest until the execution of the Ashburton treaty in 1842. 1782

Fisheries

The fishery discussion was long and tedious, but finally, largely through the urgency of Adams, who as a New Englander was most interested, the Americans were conceded the right to take fish on the banks of Newfoundland "and at all other places in the sea where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to fish." They were to be allowed to dry and cure fish "in any of the unsettled bays, harbours, and creeks of Nova Scotia, Magdalen Islands, and Labrador, so long as the same shall remain unsettled," but were not allowed that right on the coast of Newfoundland. The fisheries were to the United States more than a source of profitable trade; they were "the training school of a splendid race of seamen, the nursery of naval heroes."

Creditors, Loyalists, etc.

The other most important articles concerned the collection of debts, the treatment of the loyalists, and the navigation of the Mississippi. Both parties agreed that creditors should "meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of the full value in sterling money, of all bona fide debts heretofore contracted." In the matter of the loyalists, the Americans agreed that there should be no future confiscations or prosecutions. They also promised that congress should recommend to the states that they restore confiscated property, but the British commissioners were given to understand that the recommendation could not be enforced. From its source to the gulf, the great river was forever to remain free and 1782 open to the subjects of both nations. But Spain held both banks at the mouth of the Mississippi and her monarch was little likely to view with favor this agreement to wrest from him his right to grant ingress and egress as he saw fit—a right well recognized by public law. When Rayneval complained that this provision would embarrass Spain, Shelburne replied that "all which concerned Spain mattered little to him."

Liberal Terms

In negotiating the treaty, the English cabinet had shown a disposition to deal generously with America. In Europe, the terms of the treaty were regarded as astonishingly liberal. Vergennes wrote to Rayneval that Britain had rather bought a peace than made one, and said that the stipulations exceeded anything he had believed possible. To Rayneval, it seemed like a dream. Aranda, the Spanish ambassador, wrote to his king: "This federal republic is born a pigmy. A day will come when it will be a giant; even a Colossus, formidable to these countries. Liberty of conscience, the facility for establishing a new population on immense lands, as well as the advantages of the new government, will draw thither farmers and artisans from all the nations. In a few years we shall watch with grief the tyrannical existence of this same Colossus." In the same prophetic spirit, the Venetian ambassador wrote: "If the union of the American provinces shall continue, they will become by force of time and of the arts the most formidable power in the world." "It is impossible," says Lecky, "not to be struck with the skill, hardihood, and good fortune that marked the American negotiations. Everything the United States could, with any shadow of plausibility, demand from England, they obtained; and much of what they obtained was granted in opposition to the two great powers by whose assistance they had triumphed. . . . America gained at the peace almost everything she desired, and started, with every promise of future greatness, upon the mighty career that was before her."

December 4

Without delay, Franklin laid the whole matter, except the secret article, before Vergennes who replied in a reproachful letter in which he said: "I am at a loss to explain your conduct and that of your colleagues on this occasion. . . . You perfectly understand what is due to propriety; you have all your life performed your duties. I pray you to consider how you propose to fulfill those which are due to the king." Franklin replied soothingly: "Nothing has been agreed in the preliminaries, contrary to the interests of France; and no peace is to take place between us and England till you have concluded yours. Your observation is, however, apparently just—that in not consulting you before they were signed we have been guilty of neglecting a point of bienséance." He hoped that he and his colleagues would be pardoned and that nothing would be done to cause England to believe that she had succeeded in dividing the allies. Vergennes accepted the excuse; that he did not feel greatly aggrieved is shown by the fact that he soon promised a new loan of six million livres. 1782 1783 Vergennes Offended Information of the provisional treaty was given to congress on the twelfth of March, 1783. A few days later, Sir Henry Carleton received orders from the British ministry to proclaim a cessation of hostilities by land and sea. Washington published to the army a similar proclamation by congress on the nineteenth of April, the eighth anniversary of the fight at Lexington. Robert R. Livingston, the American secretary for foreign affairs, wrote to the commissioners at Paris expressing regret that the treaty had been signed without the knowledge of the French court and added: "It gives me pain that the character for candor and fidelity to its engagements which should always characterize a great people should have been impeached thereby." To this censure, the commissioners made joint reply, saying: "Until it be shown that we have trespassed on the rights of any man or body of men, you must excuse our thinking that this remark, as applied to our proceedings, was unnecessary. Should any explanations, How the Treaty was Received in America July 18

A GENERAL PEACE.

NEW-YORK, March 25, 1783.

LATE laſt Night, an EXPRESS from New-Jerſey, brought the following Account.

THAT on Sunday laſt, the Twenty-Third Inſtant, a Veſſel arrived at Philadelphia, in Thirty-five Days from Cadiz, with Diſpatches to the Continental Congreſs, informing them, that on Monday the Twentieth Day of January, the PRELIMINARIES to

A GENERAL PEACE,

Between Great-Britain, France, Spain, Holland, and the United States of America, were SIGNED at Paris, by all the Commiſſioners from thoſe Powers; in conſequence of which, Hoſtilities, by Sea and Land, were to ceaſe in Europe, on Wedneſday the Twentieth Day of February; and in America, on Thurſday the Twentieth Day of March, in the preſent Year One Thouſand Seven Hundred and Eighty-Three.

THIS very important Intelligence was laſt Night announced by the Firing of Cannon, and great Rejoicings at Elizabeth-Town.---Reſpecting the Particulars of this truly intereſting Event no more are yet received, but they are hourly expected.

Publiſhed by James Rivington, Printer to the King's Moſt Excellent Majeſty.

The foregoing broadſide haſ been compared with the original, in the Senate Houſe, Kingſton, N. Y., and found correct.

JULIUS SCHOONMAKER, Custodian.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 13th day of October, 1898.

C. HUME,
Notary Public.

BROADSIDE ANNOUNCING THE SIGNING OF THE PRELIMINARY TREATY

either with France or Spain, become necessary on this subject we hope and expect to meet with no embarrassment. We shall . . . tell them plainly that it was not our duty to give them the information. . . . It is not to be wondered at that we, who are on the spot and have the whole transaction under our eyes, should see many parts of it in a stronger point of light than persons at a distance." The responsibility was great, but it was taken up by great men who then went forward and won a victory the full grandeur of which we cannot even yet realize. In diplomacy as well as in war, something of discretionary power must be granted. 1782 1783

The General Treaty of Peace

The negotiations between the other belligerents and, to a certain extent, those between the United States and England had been delayed by the desire of Spain to recover Gibraltar before making peace. But the fortunes of war had changed. In April, Rodney destroyed the French fleet in the West Indies and captured Grasse as already told. In September, an attempt of the French and Spaniards upon Gibraltar was disastrously repulsed and, in October, Lord Admiral Howe succeeded in placing supplies and reinforcements in that stronghold. The European allies needed peace and, on the twentieth of January, 1783, preliminary articles were entered into by which England ceded some of her possessions, including East Florida, to Spain, and others to France, while several of the West India islands were restored to England. At the same time, England and Holland concluded a truce which was soon followed by a treaty of peace. After all their exertions, France and Spain had gained little by the war. America received the lion's share of the spoil. France added greatly to her already immense debt and made inevitable a revolution of her own.

The Coalition

Parliament had been prorogued in July, 1782, and did not meet again until the fifth of December, a few days after the signing of the preliminary treaty. In his speech from the throne, George III. announced that he had "offered to declare them [the colonies] free and 1782 independent states. . . . In thus admitting their 1783 separation I have sacrificed every consideration of my own to the wishes and opinions of my people." On the thirteenth, both houses adjourned for several weeks. On the twentieth of January, 1783, the provisional treaties with France and Spain were signed at Paris and, on the twenty-first, parliament reassembled at London. Rockingham was dead, the Shelburne ministry had never been very strong, and the treaties were unpopular. The ministerial ranks suffered by desertion and, about the middle of February, North and Fox, "Boreas" and "Reynard," entered into "The Coalition," one of the strangest alliances known in the history of politics, one that aroused the indignation of the country and the anger of the king; the young William Pitt pronounced it an ill-omened marriage and forbade the banns in the name of public safety. But the coalition did not wait long to show its strength and, on the seventeenth of March, a division of the house showed a majority of sixteen against the treaty. A few days later, the house, February 21 by a vote of two hundred and seven against one hundred and ninety, adopted a resolution that declared that "the concessions granted to the enemies of Great Britain were greater than they were entitled to." On the twenty-fourth, Shelburne resigned.

The Definitive Treaty of Peace

For more than five weeks, the country was without a government. George III. wrung his hands pathetically and complained bitterly that Lord North had betrayed him into the hands of Mr. Fox. But it was all to no purpose; parliament became furious at the long delay and the king had to accept Fox as a part of the coalition. In April, the duke of Portland, a man of great wealth and little ability, became the head of a new cabinet in which were North and Fox as secretaries of state. As soon as the new ministry got its bearings, David Hartley was sent to take Oswald's place, and the duke of Manchester was sent to aid him and Fitzherbert. Then all the resources of diplomacy were exhausted in an effort to secure a treaty that would be more acceptable to

By the UNITED STATES in CONGRESS Assembled,

A PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS definitive articles of peace and friendship between the United States of America and his Britannic majesty, were concluded and signed at Paris on the 3d day of September, 1783, by the plenipotentiaries duly authorized and empowered for that purpose, which articles are in the words following.

In the Name of the Most Holy and Undivided Trinity.

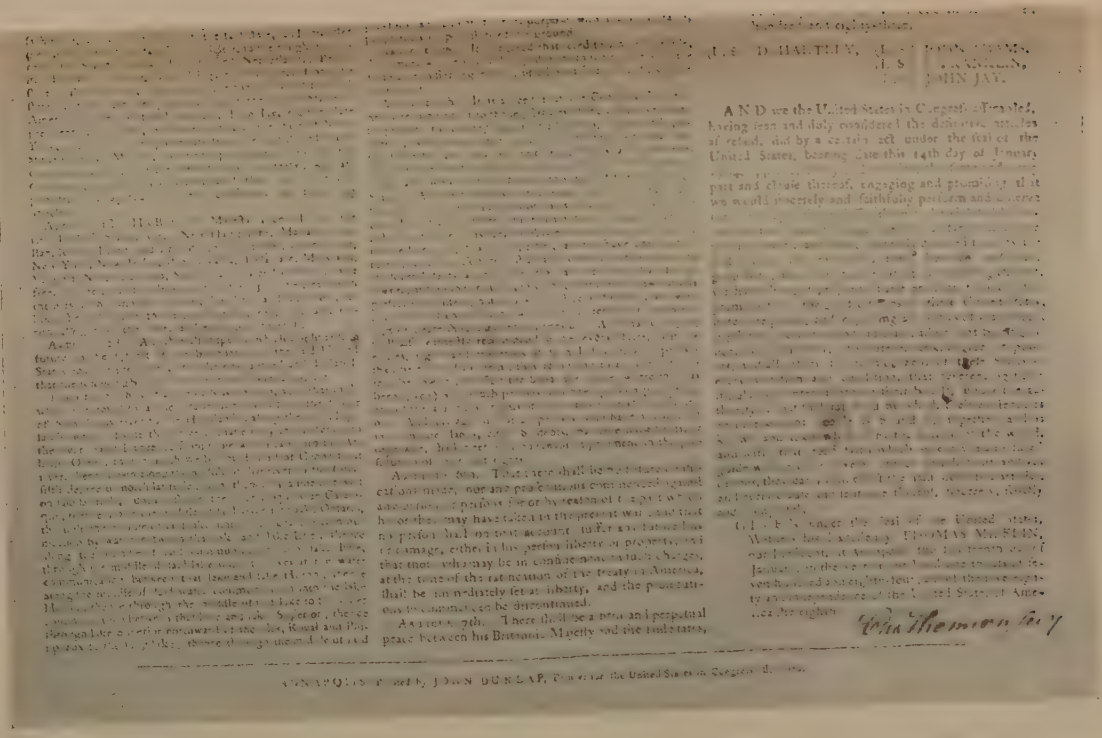

IT [illegible]

long lake and the water communication between it and the lake of the Woods, to the [illegible] through the said lakes [illegible] and from thence on a due west course to the river Mississippi, [illegible] to be drawn along the [illegible] said Mississippi, until [illegible]

And that the [illegible] and peremptorily [illegible] exceptions [illegible] without [illegible]

And that [illegible] Islands [illegible] the gulph of [illegible] where [illegible] and between the subjects of the one, and the citizens of the other, wherever all hostilities [illegible] sides shall be [illegible] shall [illegible] any [illegible] property taken [illegible] all [illegible] Ships [illegible] Ports [illegible] Islands [illegible] Ships [illegible] Ports [illegible] Islands [illegible] Ships [illegible] Ports [illegible] Islands

PROCLAMATION ANNOUNCING SIGNING OF DEFINITIVE TREATY OF PEACE
(From original in collection of the Massachusetts Historical Society)

England, but it finally became clear to both parties that the provisional articles embodied all the concessions that either could obtain from the other. Without essential change of the preliminary treaty and with the approval of Vergennes, the long-pending negotiations were brought to a close and the definitive treaty of peace was signed at the lodgings of the British minister at Paris on the third of September, 1783. Thus was Shelburne vindicated. From the American point of view, it was one of the most brilliant triumphs of modern diplomacy. The American revolution was at an end. Before the close of the year, the king turned the coalition ministry out of office. Then the younger Pitt became prime minister and, for seventeen years, ruled Great Britain with a power greater than that of any English sovereign since the days of Elizabeth.

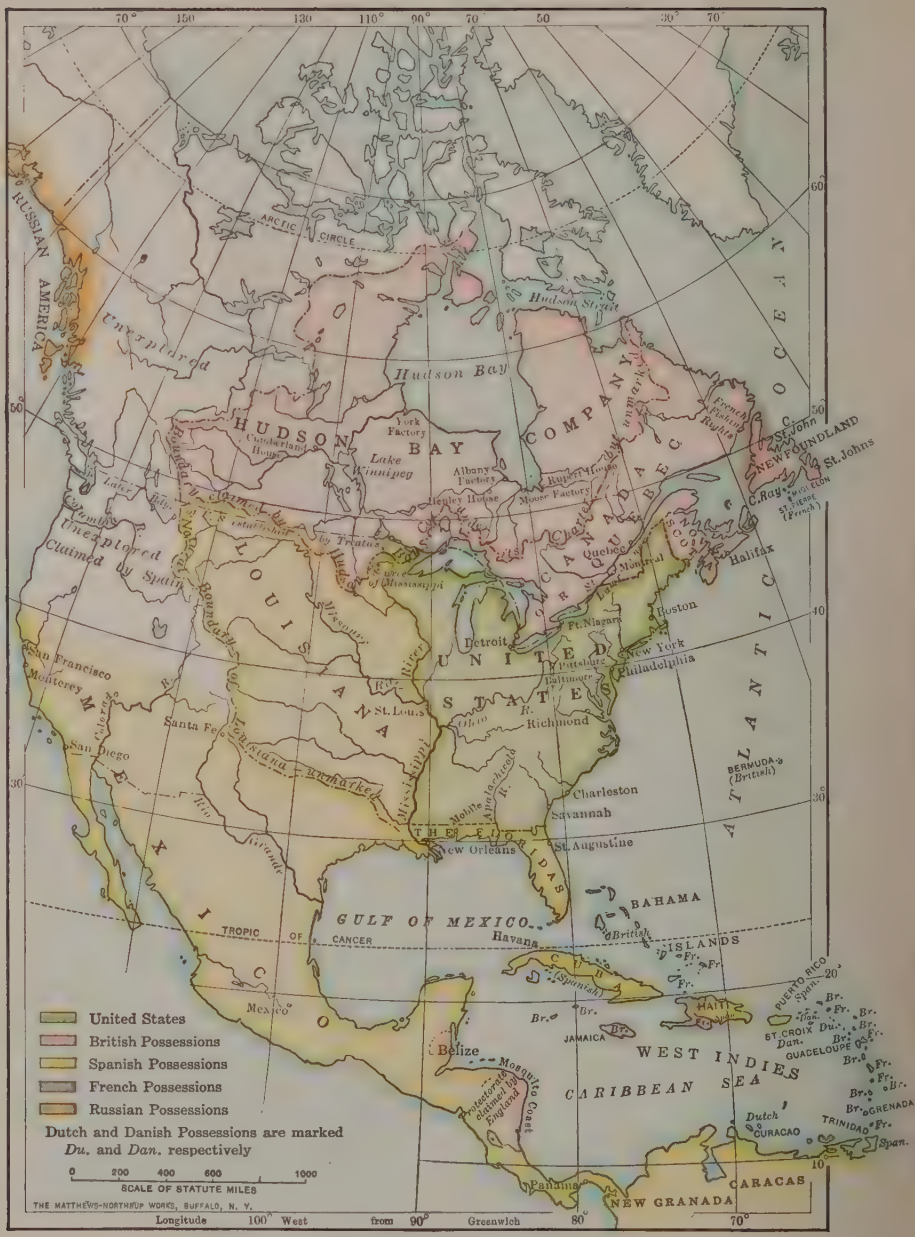

1783

Signatures to the Treaty of 1783

In America, there had been no military operations of importance since Yorktown, but the war establish-

America at Peace

North America after the Peace of 1783
(Compiled by David Maydole Matteson, A. M.)

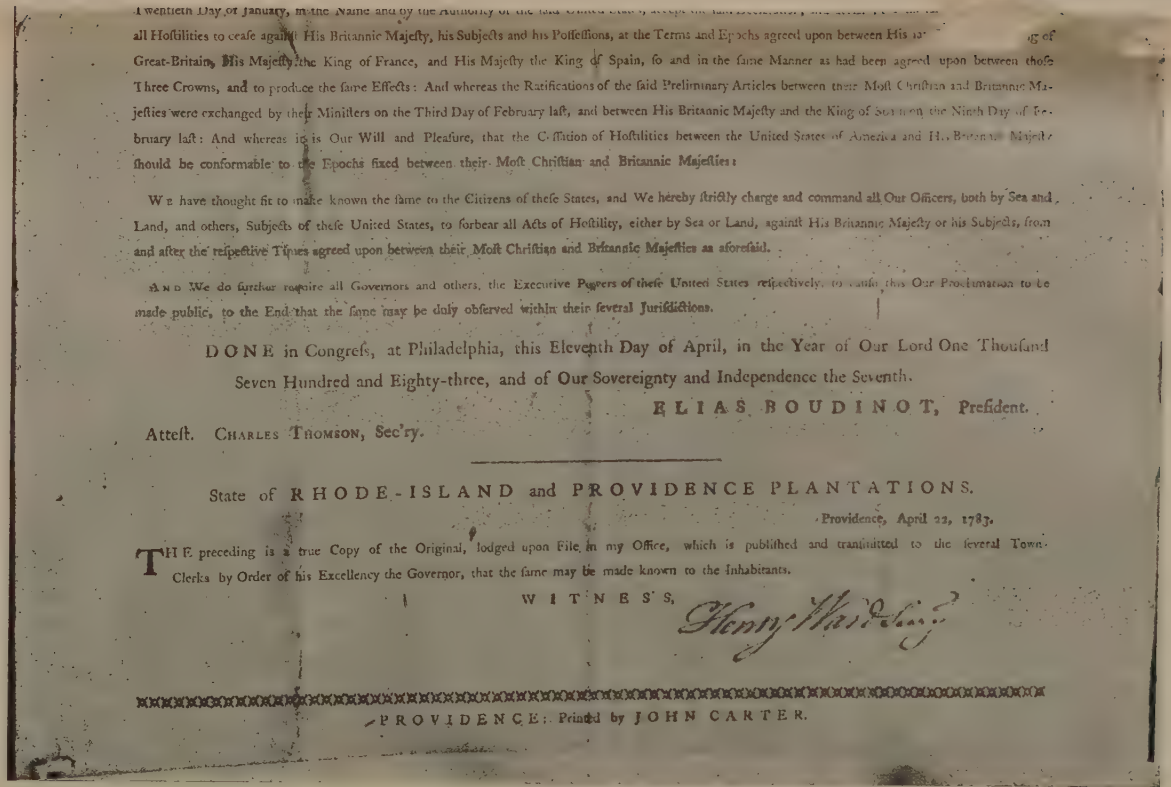

By the UNITED STATES of America, in Congrefs aſſembled.

A PROCLAMATION,

Declaring the Ceſſation of Arms, as well by Sea as by Land, agreed upon between the United States of America and His Britannic Majeſty; and enjoining the Obſervance thereof.

WHEREAS Proviſional Articles were ſigned at Paris, on the Thirtieth Day of November, in the Year of our Lord One Thouſand Seven Hundred and Eighty-two, between the Miniſters Plenipotentiary of the United States of America, for treating of Peace, and the Miniſter Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majeſty, to be inſerted in and to conſtitute the Treaty of Peace, propoſed to be concluded between the United States of America and His Britannic Majeſty, when Terms of Peace ſhould be agreed upon between their Moſt Chriſtian and Britannic Majeſties: And whereas Preliminaries, for reſtoring Peace between their Moſt Chriſtian and Britannic Majeſties, were ſigned at Verſailles, on the Twentieth Day of January laſt, by the Miniſters of their Moſt Chriſtian and Britannic Majeſties: And whereas Preliminaries, for reſtoring Peace between the ſaid King of Great-Britain and the King of Spain, were alſo ſigned at Verſailles on the ſame Twentieth Day of January laſt.

By which ſaid Preliminary Articles it hath been agreed, That as ſoon as the ſame were ratified, Hoſtilities between the ſaid Kingdoms, Provinces and Subjects, ſhould ceaſe in all Parts of the World; and it was farther agreed, That all Veſſels and Effects that might be taken in the Channel and in the North Seas, after the Space of Twelve Days from the Ratification of the ſaid Preliminary Articles, ſhould be reſtored: that the Term ſhould be One Month from the Channel and North Seas as far as the Canary Iſlands incluſive, whether in the Ocean or the Mediterranean: Two Months for the Iſlands and the whole Extent of the Atlantic Line or Equator; and laſtly, Five Months in all other Parts of the World, without any Exception, or more particular Deſcription of Time or Places: And whereas it was declared, by the Miniſter Plenipotentiary of the King of Great-Britain, in the Name and by the expreſs Order of the ſaid Kingdoms, on the ſaid Twentieth Day of January laſt, that the ſaid United States of America, their Subjects and their Poſſeſſions ſhall be comprized in the above mentioned Suſpenſion of Arms, at the ſame Epochs, and in the ſame Manner, as the Three Crowns above mentioned, their Subjects and Poſſeſſions reſpectively; upon Condition that, on the Part and in the Name of the United States of America, a ſimilar Declaration ſhall be delivered, expreſſly declaring their Aſſent to the ſaid Suſpenſion of Arms, and containing an Aſſurance of the moſt perfect Reciprocity on their Part: And whereas the Miniſters Plenipotentiary of theſe United States did, on the ſame Twentieth Day of January, in the Name and by the Authority of the said United States, accepts the said Declaration, and [illegible]

all Hoſtilities to ceaſe againſt His Britannic Majeſty, his Subjects and his Poſſeſſions, at the Terms and Epochs agreed upon between His [illegible] of Great-Britain, His Majeſty the King of France, and His Majeſty the King of Spain, ſo and in the ſame Manner as had been agreed upon between thoſe Three Crowns, and to produce the ſame Effects: And whereas the Ratifications of the ſaid Preliminary Articles between their Moſt Chriſtian and Britannic Majeſties were exchanged by their Miniſters on the Third Day of February laſt, and between His Britannic Majeſty and the King of Spain on the Ninth Day of February laſt: And whereas it is Our Will and Pleaſure, that the Ceſſation of Hoſtilities between the United States of America and His Britannic Majeſty ſhould be conformable to the Epochs fixed between their Moſt Chriſtian and Britannic Majeſties:

WE have thought fit to make known the ſame to the Citizens of theſe States, and We hereby ſtrictly charge and command all Our Officers, both by Sea and Land, and others, Subjects of theſe United States, to forbear all Acts of Hoſtility, either by Sea or Land, againſt His Britannic Majeſty or his Subjects, from and after the reſpective Times agreed upon between their Moſt Chriſtian and Britannic Majeſties as aforeſaid.

AND We do further require all Governors and others, the Executive Powers of theſe United States reſpectively, to cauſe this Our Proclamation to be made public, to the End that the ſame may be duly obſerved within their ſeveral Juriſdictions.

DONE in Congreſs, at Philadelphia, this Eleventh Day of April, in the Year of Our Lord One Thouſand Seven Hundred and Eighty-three, and of Our Sovereignty and Independence the Seventh.

ELIAS BOUDINOT, Preſident.

Atteſt. CHARLES THOMSON, Sec'ry.

State of RHODE-ISLAND and PROVIDENCE PLANTATIONS.

Providence, April 22, 1783.

THE preceding is a true Copy of the Original, lodged upon File in my Office, which is publiſhed and tranſmitted to the ſeveral Town-Clerks by Order of his Excellency the Governor, that the ſame may be made known to the Inhabitants.

WITNESS, Henry Ward, Sec'y.

PROVIDENCE: Printed by JOHN CARTER.

PROCLAMATION BY ELIAS BOUDINOT, APRIL 11, 1783, DECLARING CESSATION OF HOSTILITES

(Broadside published in Rhode Island, April 22, 1783; reproduced from copy in collection of the Rhode Island Historical Society)

ment was kept up to guard against the dangers of over- 1783 confidence and a possible renewal of active operations. In April, 1782, Washington left Philadelphia and took up his headquarters with the troops on the Hudson where, in September, he was joined by Rochambeau and his soldiers. In October, the French troops embarked for France. Charleston, the last post held by the British in the South, was evacuated on the fourteenth of December, 1782. On the eleventh of April, 1783, congress proclaimed a cessation of hostilities by land and sea; on the nineteenth, the proclamation was published to the army.

Washington's Headquarters at Newburg

General Henry Knox
(Reproduced from Stuart's painting deposited by the City of Boston in the Museum of Fine Arts)

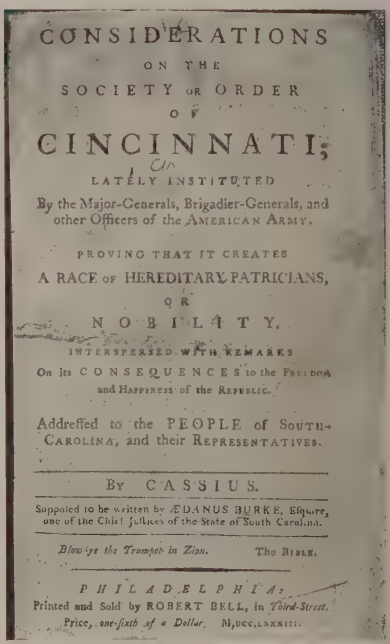

CONCORD:
April 19, 1775

PEACE:
April 19, 1783

1783 In May, the Society of the Cincinnati was founded in the Verplanck house near Fishkill. This organization of officers of the Revolution was established at the suggestion of General Knox to perpetuate "the mutual friendships formed under the pressure of common danger;" membership was hereditary through a line of eldest sons. The presidency of the order was held by Washington until his death. The hereditary clause in its constitution, which caused much adverse criticism among the civil leaders of the Revolution, has resulted in the perpetuation of the society to the present day. In June, many of the troops were dismissed on furlough and Washington issued his last circular to the governors of all the states, a "legacy" full of warning and wise counsel.

Order of the Society of the Cincinnati (Worn by His Excellency President-general George Washington at the first meeting of the General Society, Philadelphia, May, 1784. Direct reproduction from the original through kindness of the Hon. Asa Bird Gardiner, LL. D., L. H. D., M. H., President of the Rhode Island State Society of the Cincinnati and Secretary-general)

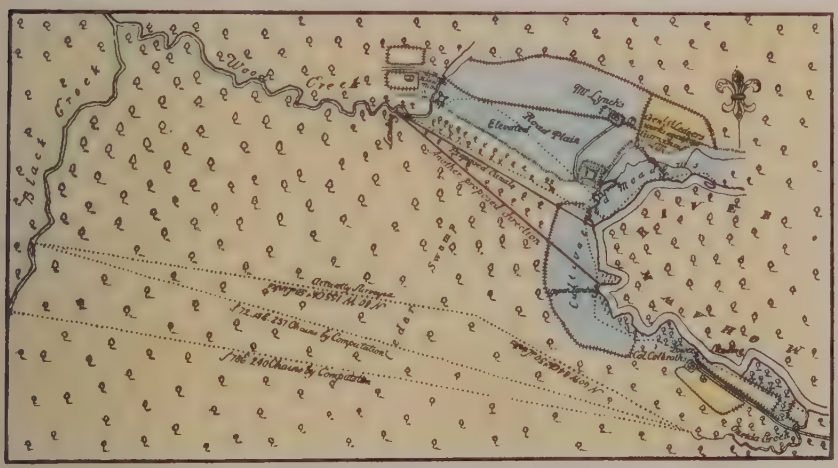

CONSIDERATIONS
ON THE
SOCIETY OR ORDER
OF CINCINNATI;
LATELY INSTITUTED
By the Major-Generals, Brigadier-Generals, and other Officers of the AMERICAN ARMY.
PROVING THAT IT CREATES A RACE OF HEREDITARY PATRICIANS, OR NOBILITY.
INTERSPERSED WITH REMARKS
On its CONSEQUENCES to the FREEDOM and HAPPINESS of the REPUBLIC.
Addreſſed to the PEOPLE of SOUTH-CAROLINA, and their REPRESENTATIVES.
BY CASSIUS.
Suppoſed to be written by ÆDANUS BURKE, Eſquire, one of the Chief Juſtices of the State of South Carolina.
Blow ye the Trumpet in Zion. The BIBLE.
PHILADELPHIA:
Printed and Sold by ROBERT BELL, in Third-Street.
Price, one-ſixth of a Dollar. M,DCC,LXXXIII.

Title-page of Aedanus Burke's Pamphlet on the Order of the Cincinnati

On the sixteenth of July, Washington wrote to the president of congress that, finding himself "without command, and with little else to do, than to be teased with troublesome applications and fruitless demands," he had "resolved to wear away a little time, in performing a tour to the northward, as far as Ticonderoga and Crown Point, and perhaps as far up the Mohawk River as Fort Schuyler. I shall leave this place on Friday next, and shall probably be gone about two weeks." He was already giving consideration to "the operations, which will be necessary for occupying the posts which are ceded by the treaty of peace as soon as they shall be evacuated by the British troops" and "supplying all the garrisons on the western waters by the provision contract. I can only form my magazine at Fort Herkimer, on the German Flats, which is thirty-two miles by land and almost fifty by water from the carrying-place between the Mohawk River and Wood Creek. The route by the former is impracticable in the present state for carriages; and the other extremely difficult for batteaux." The difficulties of the situation suggested to Governor George Clinton, who was with Washington,

1783 Washington's Vacation Tour

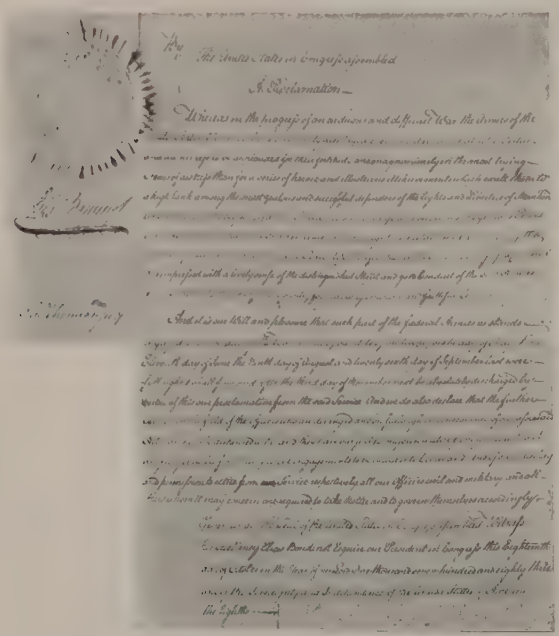

An Early Survey for a Canal at Fort Stanwix

1783 the building of a canal between Wood Creek and the Mohawk. In his speech opening the New York legislature in 1791, Clinton recommended the project. In the next century, the governor's idea was carried out to its logical conclusion in the building of the Erie and the Champlain canals by his nephew, Governor DeWitt Clinton.

Disbanding the Army

October 18

Many of the troops having been previously dismissed on furlough, congress directed by proclamation the disbandment of the army on the second of November. On that day, the commander-in-chief sent out his last general order to the members of the armies of the United States wherever they might be. Mingling praise, gratitude, and admonition, he also pointed out their remaining duty to their country. Mr. Bancroft says that he sent them forth, every one, as an apostle of union under a new constitution. A small remnant of the continental army was retained in service under the command of General Knox. On the twenty-fifth of November, Guy Carleton, who had succeeded General Clinton early in May, withdrew his forces from New York. Washington and Governor Clinton entered the upper end of the town while the British embarked at the lower end. For many years, "Evacuation Day" was celebrated in the city with fireworks and military display.

Proclamation by Elias Boudinot disbanding the Continental Army

1783

Negro Soldiers

From the days when General Artemas Ward gathered his gallant band at Cambridge, free negroes had been enrolled as members of the patriot army. At first, and especially in New England, they took their places in the ranks with white men and, on the rolls of many companies, their names appear side by side with those of other soldiers of the Revolution. Before many months had gone by, Edward Rutledge of South Carolina, in the continental congress, moved that all the negroes in the army be discharged. He was warmly supported by other southern delegates, but there was determined opposition and the motion was lost. In October, 1775, a conference at the camp, attended by Franklin, Harrison, and Lynch, members of the congress, "agreed unanimously, to reject all slaves, and, by a great majority, to reject negroes altogether" from the new enlistment, but, when the American tri-color was unfurled over the continental army around Boston, free negroes still were standing in the ranks by the side of white men. Washington had reversed the decision of the conference and appealed to congress for its approval upon his action. That body referred the matter to a committee consisting of Wythe, Wilson, and Samuel Adams, and, on their report, it was resolved "that the free negroes who have served faithfully in the army at Cambridge may be re-enlisted therein, but no others." "The right of free negroes to take part in the defence of the country having thus been partially admitted by the highest power, the limitation was lost sight of." Among those who fell in the disastrous battles of Long Island in 1776 were many colored American soldiers of whom, about the middle of the nineteenth century, Theodore Parker exclaimed: "Happy are the dead Africans whom the British shot mowed down!" Among those who fell in the massacre at Fort Griswold "when Arnold burnt the town" in September, 1781, were Jordan Freeman and Sambo Latham, negroes. At Monmouth, more than seven hundred colored men fought side by side with white men, and, at the end of the war, Brister Baker was

September 26, 1775

December 31, 1775

BY HIS EXCELLENCY

GEORGE WASHINGTON, ESQ;

General and Commander in Chief of the Forces of the United States of America.

THESE are to CERTIFY that the Bearer hereof [illegible] in the [illegible] Regiment, having faithfully ſerved the United States from April 8th 1777 to June 8th 1783 — and being inliſted for the War only, is hereby DISCHARGED from the American Army.

GIVEN at HEAD-QUARTERS the 8th June 1783

G. Washington

By HIS EXCELLENCY'S Command,

[illegible]

REGISTERED in the Books of the Regiment,

[illegible] Adjutant,

THE above [illegible] has been honored with the BADGE of MERIT for [illegible] Years faithful Service. G. Washington

HEAD-QUARTERS, June 8th 1783.

THE within CERTIFICATE ſhall not avail the Bearer as a Diſcharge, until the Ratification of the definitive Treaty of Peace; previous to which Time, and until Proclamation thereof ſhall be made, He is to be conſidered as being on Furlough.

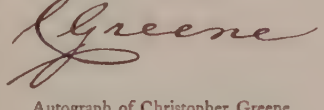

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

A NEGRO SOLDIER'S DISCHARGE AFTER THE WAR

discharged with the badge of merit for six years of faithful service. 1783

Negro Companies and Regiments

The muster-rolls of Connecticut troops indicate that negroes were withdrawn from military bodies in which they had served with white men and were gathered into companies by themselves. The captain of one of the companies of this black battalion was David Humphreys, later an aide to Washington, the author of stirring lyric and satiric verses, and brigadier-general in command of Connecticut's "Veteran Volunteers" in the war of 1812. After the arrival of his command at Washington's camp at Valley Forge, General Varnum of Rhode Island suggested that a battalion of negroes might be raised in that state. Governor Nicholas Cooke laid the matter before the Rhode Island general assembly, then in session at East Greenwich. Since December, 1776, Newport had been in the hands of the British. The legislature accordingly "voted and resolved that every able-bodied negro, mulatto, or Indian man slave, in this state, may enlist into either of the said two battalions, to serve during the continuance of the present war with Great Britain. That every slave, so enlisting, shall be entitled to, and receive, all the bounties, wages, and encouragements, allowed by the Continental Congress to any soldier enlisting into their service. It is further voted and resolved that every slave so enlisting, shall, upon his passing muster before Col. Christopher Greene, be immediately discharged from the service of his master or mistress, and be absolutely Free, as though he had never been encumbered with any kind of servitude or slavery"—the first emancipation act of legislation in the history of the state. The assembly also voted bounties for the blacks and compensation for their masters, and Rhode Island's "black regiment" became famous for its "deeds of desperate valor." Colonel Greene, a cousin of General Greene, had followed Arnold through the wilderness to Quebec in 1775,

Autograph of Christopher Greene

WASHINGTON RESIGNING HIS COMMISSION

(Close facsimile of the original picture painted by John Trumbull in 1787. It is now in the Trumbull Gallery, Yale University, New Haven, Connecticut) and earned the sword that congress later voted for his defense of Fort Mercer in 1777; on his fatal day in May, 1781, the sabers of the enemy did not reach him until every one of his faithful guard of blacks had been killed. Subsequently, New York and other states passed similar acts granting freedom to slaves who enlisted in the army. At the end of the war, Virginia passed an act emancipating all the slaves from that state who had served in the army with the consent of their masters.

1783

Flag of the "Bucks of America," a Colored Regiment that served in the Revolution
(From collection of the Massachusetts Historical Society)

March 20, 1781

October, 1783

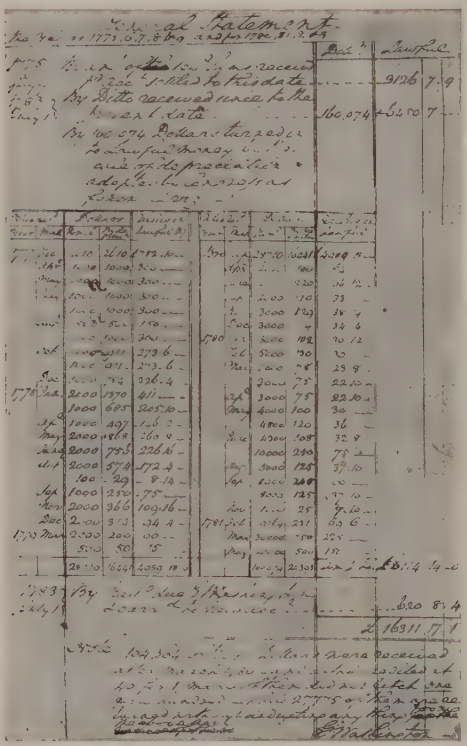

On the fourth of December, 1783, in a room of Fraunces's Tavern, his headquarters in New York City, Washington took leave of the officers who through good and evil days had followed him to the grand consummation of their hopes. As he looked upon his old comrades in arms, his usual self-command deserted him and his voice broke. Filling a glass of wine, he raised it and said: "With a heart full of love and gratitude, I now take my leave of you, most devoutly wishing that your latter days may be as prosperous as your former ones have been glorious and honorable." After the

Washington Takes Leave of his Officers

Whitehall Ferry Tablet

1783 toast had been drunk in silence, he added: "I cannot come to each of you and take my leave, but shall be obliged if you will come and take me by the hand." In silence and not without tears, he bade each farewell and then, accompanied by all, walked to Whitehall Ferry. As the oars of his barge struck the water, he stood up and raised his hat. "In solemn silence his officers returned the salute, and watched the noble and gracious figure of their beloved chief until the boat disappeared from sight behind the point of the Battery."

Last Page of Washington's Military Accounts of the American Revolution

Congress Ratifies the Treaty of Peace

Already the confederation of the thirteen states was in the first stage of "that long collapse out of which were to arise the more compact powers of the constitution." When congress

November 26 met at Annapolis, there were present only fifteen members representing only seven states. Several weeks

December 23 later, with only twenty delegates in attendance, Washington returned his commission and then rode away to Mount Vernon to keep his Christmas as a private citizen. A special effort was then made to secure the attendance of absent representatives and, on the fourteenth of January, 1784, the treaty of peace was ratified by twenty-three delegates from nine states, the necessary number, and was then proclaimed to the people. 1784

CHAPTER XVIII

DISABLED AND DRIFTING

Discontent in the Army

PEACE came none too soon. Discontent in the army had reached such a point that a new revolution was narrowly averted. In October, 1780, the officers had been promised half pay for life, but nothing had been done to fulfil the pledge and the private soldiers were left without even a promise. By the spring of 1782, many officers were doubtful whether congress would be able to redeem its pledge and began to desire a change in the form of government. Acting probably in behalf of some such, how many is not known, Colonel Lewis Nicola, a foreign-born officer in the Pennsylvania line, wrote a letter to Washington hinting that he should accept the crown. Washington repelled the suggestion saying: "I am much at a loss to conceive what part of my conduct could have given encouragement" to such an address and "If I am not deceived in the knowledge of myself, you could not have found a person to whom your schemes are more disagreeable."

May 22, 1782

The Troops Send an Address to Congress

In December, Washington's ill-clad troops were in winter quarters on the wooded hills in the rear of Newburg. Hunger joined hands with wintry cold to multiply discomforts and the leisure of the camp gave opportunity for brooding over their accumulated wrongs and for counting up their wealth of unfulfilled promises to pay. They therefore drew up an address that they sent to congress. "We have borne all that men can bear—our property is expended—our private resources at an end, and our friends wearied out and disgusted with our incessant applications." The memorial was referred to a grand committee that conferred with the superintendent of finance who said that it was impossible to pay and that it would be imprudent even to make any more promises of paying. The report of the grand committee was prepared by Hamilton who had renounced his individual claim for half pay. It advised a payment as soon as possible, after which the troops and other creditors alike were to wait for the funding of the public debt. It was hoped that the zeal of the army and of all other creditors might be enlisted in aid of some efficient scheme for permanent sources of revenue to be collected by authority of congress. Thus Hamilton wrote to Washington that the claims of the army, "urged with moderation but firmness, may operate on those weak minds which are influenced by their apprehensions more than by their judgments, so as to produce a concurrence in the measures which the exigencies of affairs demand," and Gouverneur Morris wrote to General Greene: "If the army in common with all other public creditors insist on the granting of general permanent funds for liquidating all the public debts, there can be little doubt that such revenues will be obtained and will afford to every order of public creditors a solid security. With the due exception of miracles, there is no probability that the states will ever make such grants unless the army be united and determined in the pursuit of it and unless they be firmly supported by and as firmly support the other creditors." To hasten such an end, Robert Morris sent to congress a communication saying: "The funding the public debt on solid revenues I fear will never be made. If before the end of May effectual measures to make permanent provision for the public debts of every kind are not taken, congress will be pleased to appoint some other man to be the superintendent of finances; I will never be the minister of injustice." Early in February and 1783

January 6, 1783

February -

January 24

1783 by the authority of congress, Morris issued his warrants for a month's pay, a total of a little more than a quarter million dollars.

The Newburg Letters

On the tenth of March, 1783, an anonymous call for a meeting of the officers on the evening of the following day was circulated. The letter seems to have been written by a member of General Gates's staff, Major John Armstrong, son of the general of that name whom we met at Brandywine. The purpose of the able document doubtless was to arouse congress to a sense of justice to an army that was about to be disbanded, but its impassioned language was more likely to excite the resentment of the troops. "Can you then," the paper asked, "consent to be the only sufferers by this revolution, and retiring from the field, grow old in poverty and wretchedness and contempt? Can you consent to wade through the vile mire of despondency, and owe the miserable remnant of that life to charity, which has hitherto been spent in honour! If you can—GO—and carry with you the jest of tories and the scorn of whigs—the ridicule, and what is worse, the pity of the world. Go, starve, and be forgotten!"

A COLLECTION of PAPERS, RELATIVE TO HALF-PAY
AND COMMUTATION
OF HALF-PAY,
GRANTED BY CONGRESS TO THE OFFICERS of the ARMY.
COMPILED

Title-page of the first Printed Edition of the Newburg Letters

Washington Saves the Day

The situation was full of danger. Even Robert Morris, Gouverneur Morris, and Alexander Hamilton had come to the conclusion that forbearance had ceased to be a virtue, but Washington saw that such a movement once begun might become uncontrollable. He had issued general orders forbidding the meeting and calling for one at noon of the following Saturday, when suddenly a second anonymous address appeared. At the appointed time, the officers assembled with General Gates in the chair. Washington took his place at the desk and, in eloquent words, appealed to the patriotism of the officers. "Let me conjure you," he said, "in the name of our common country, as you value your own sacred honor, as you respect the rights of humanity, and as you regard the military and national character of America, to express your utmost horror and detestation of the man, who wishes, under specious pretences, to overturn the liberties of our country, and who wickedly attempts to open the flood-gates of civil discord, and deluge our rising empire in blood." When he finished, most of the officers were in tears; after his withdrawal, they passed resolutions unanimously condemning the anonymous proposals and asking Washington to press their claims. Thus "that body of officers, in a moment, damned with infamy two publications, which, during the four preceding days, most of them had read with admiration, and talked of with rapture." It may be doubted whether Washington ever performed a greater patriotic service than on this occasion. 1783 March 15

Upon Washington's representations, congress soon commuted half pay for life into a sum equal to five years' full pay, for which certificates bearing interest at six per cent. were to be issued. Even this measure aroused great opposition among sturdy fireside patriots who were anxious for liberty but unwilling to pay its price. Meanwhile, steps were taken to reduce the army, as explained in the preceding chapter. The veterans, at least such of them as still had homes, went home peacefully without a settlement of their accounts or a penny in their pockets. In little groups of four or five they trudged along, living in great part on farmhouse hospitality. At his journey's end, the veteran hung his memorial musket over the chimneypiece and Congressional Action and Impotence March 22

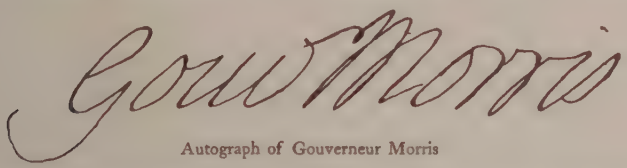

1783 turned again to the furrow and the cattle; years of 1784 suffering behind and years of poverty before. But some of the new Pennsylvania troops at Lancaster, "soldiers
June 19, 1783 of a day" Washington called them, mutinied. About eighty strong, they marched to Philadelphia and created such a terror that congress fled to Princeton. No more convincing proof of the impotence of congress could be found. McMaster says that it had "degenerated into a debating club, and a debating club of no very high order. Neglected by its own members, insulted and threatened by its mutinous troops, reviled by the press, and forced to wander from city to city in search of an abiding place, its acts possessed no national importance June 3, 1784 whatever." A year later, it closed a session at Annapolis to meet at Trenton on the thirteenth of October, leaving the management of federal affairs in the hands of a "grand committee" of one from each state. Four of the committee attended none of its sessions and, one day in August, some of the others angrily left the room and thus broke the quorum. On the next day, three of the nine set out for their homes; until the reassembling of congress, the country was without even the shadow of a government.

Welcome to Lafayette

In this summer of 1784, the people of America were gladdened by the return of Lafayette from France. He landed on the fourth of August and went directly to Mount Vernon. Thence he hastened to New York and, in September, went up the Hudson to Albany. In October, he was given a memorable entertainment at Boston whence he went by water to Annapolis and thence again to Mount Vernon. On the ninth of December, he was at Philadelphia where bonfires lighted up the streets and the bells were rung from the time of his arrival until ten o'clock at night. He took formal leave of congress at Trenton and, on Christmas Day, sailed from New York for France. Everywhere he had been received with the homage and enthusiastic welcome of a grateful people.

The articles of confederation were ratified in 1781;

before the end of that year, Gouverneur Morris wrote to General Greene: "I have no expectation that the government will acquire force; and no hope that our 1781 1783 The Need of Coercive Power union can subsist, except in the form of an absolute monarchy, and this does not seem to consist with the taste and temper of the people." Before the war was over, such men as Washington, Madison, and Hamilton foresaw the failure of the confederation and urged a stronger government. And yet, this unstable league, with its paralyzing inadequacy of central powers, was, perhaps, the best that could then be secured. In 1782, under Hamilton's influence, New York proposed a convention of the states to revise and amend the articles, but congress did not act upon the recommendation. In congress itself, Madison brought in a committee report pointing out that, as the states had promised to observe the articles of confederation, congress had a right to carry said articles into effect. In order that there might be no question regarding this coercive power, the committee advised the adoption of a new article expressly conferring upon congress the power to compel the states to observe their federal obligations. In the following August, a new committee reported that the articles needed execution in twenty-one particulars and recommended that seven new powers be conferred upon the congress.

Autograph of Gouverneur Morris

As it was necessary to obtain the consent of all the states, it was impossible to amend the articles. In February, 1781, it was proposed that congress should be given the power to levy a duty of five per cent. on imports, the proceeds "to be applied to the discharge of the principal and interest of the debts already contracted." The proposal was reasonable, twelve states assented, but Rhode Island stubbornly refused. In Difficulty of Amendment 1782 1783 April, 1783, congress asked for power to levy impost duties for twenty-five years, the duties to be collected by officers appointed by the states. Again twelve states assented, some of them with qualifications, but New York, "quite content to levy her own tax upon foreign commodities as well as upon garden-truck from New Jersey and firewood from Connecticut," was obdurate. In April, 1784, congress asked the right to regulate foreign commerce for fifteen years in order to be able to retaliate against unfriendly European powers, but this scheme, too, came to naught.

Treaty Obligations

In perhaps no other way did the incompetence of the confederation reveal itself more disgracefully than in its foreign relations. Congress found itself unable to secure the observance of the treaty of peace either as to debts or Tories. The promise that no new legislation should be directed against the loyalists and the congressional recommendation that they should be restored to their rights and privileges were disregarded by the states. When peace came, indignation against those "fawning spaniels," those "tools and minions of Britain," was still running high. "As Hannibal swore never to be at peace with the Romans," said the Massachusetts Chronicle, "so let every Whig swear, by his abhorrence of slavery, by liberty and religion, by the shades of departed friends who have fallen in battle, by the ghosts of those of our brethren who have been destroyed on board of prison-ships and in loathsome dungeons, never to be at peace with those fiends the refugees, whose thefts, murders, and treasons have filled the cup of woe." In other newspapers, in hundreds of pamphlets, wherever men congregated, and even from the pulpit such sentiments were expressed. The loyalists who still clung to their homes had lost all political influence and it would have been wiser, as some moderate men advised, to allow them to remain quietly where they were than to drive them forth to found unfriendly colonies in Canada, where, in the war of 1812, they were our most bitter enemies.

1782
1784

The Vials of Wrath

The Tories themselves had foreseen the wrath to come and many had evaded it by leaving with the British troops. In one year, about twenty thousand refugees sailed from New York; those who remained were treated with great severity. It was enacted that no one should vote unless he would take an "iron-clad oath" that he had never aided or abetted the enemy. No Tory who had left the state was to be allowed to return, and a trespass act that contravened both the treaty of peace and the established rules of war was passed—a very carnival of spoliation. In the case of Rutgers vs. Waddington, Alexander Hamilton acted as counsel for the defendant and the court nullified the act. The decision aroused great indignation and was condemned by an extra session of the legislature. For a time, Hamilton was so unpopular that the members of a club of politicians seriously considered a proposition for successively challenging him to mortal combat until one of them should kill him. In other states, similar laws were enacted. Where there was no new legislation, popular indignation supplied its place. In South Carolina, for example, prominent loyalists were ordered to leave the country and some were shot and hanged. Throughout the country they were tarred and feathered, ridden on rails and otherwise maltreated. Moderation, however, gradually prevailed and, in most of the states, the confiscatory and other acts were repealed.

MAYOR' COURT
NEW-YORK,
IN A CAUSE
ELIZABETH RUTGERS
AND

Title-page of the Rutgers vs. Waddington Case

1783
1790

British Generosity and Justice

Before the change came, from sixty to one hundred thousand Tories left the country. Some of these refugees went to England, but most of them went to Nova Scotia, Upper Canada, and other British possessions north of the United States. In July, 1783, just before the definitive treaty of peace was signed, the king proposed to parliament what was known as the compensation act and commissioners were appointed to inquire into the claims of those who had suffered "in consequence of their loyalty to his Majesty and attachment to the British government." The British government dealt with them in a spirit of generosity as well as of justice, expending at least thirty million dollars in relief —a far more ample provision than congress was able to make for the ragged soldiers of the Revolution. In their Canadian homes, some of the exiles prospered, others failed; in time, some drifted back to the United States. "But many thousands remained, and, when, years later, they had made of the land of their exile a mighty member of the British empire, they began to glory in the days of trial through which they had passed. Today, their descendants, organized as the United Empire Loyalists, count it an honor that their ancestors suffered persecution and exile rather than yield the principle and the ideal of union with Great Britain." But the old animosity is dead. Refugee descendants in "The Dominion" clasp hands with "rebel" offspring in "The States" and together sing their devoted loyalty to the same tune which the former call "God Save the King," and the latter call "America."

A Submarine Railway

When the British evacuated the seaports that they held, they carried away many escaped slaves. The number thus lost was vastly exaggerated and the British were not as culpable as the Americans pretended to believe. The slaves carried away from Savannah and Charleston were taken either before the preliminary treaty was made or before its terms were known in America. At New York, the only port where the British were strictly bound by the terms of the treaty, General Carleton replied to complaints that any negro entering his lines came presumably as a freeman and that he could not return him. This British policy as to slaves was one excuse for the severity of the American policy as to loyalists. 1783 1787

Diplomatic Relations with England

In May, 1784, Franklin, Adams, and Jefferson were made a special commission to negotiate commercial treaties with European powers. In 1785, a treaty of commerce was made with Prussia, after which and at his own request, Franklin was recalled. He arrived at Philadelphia in September. In February, 1785, Adams was commissioned as the first American minister to England, and, in March, Jefferson was sent as minister to France. Adams was courteously received by George III., but he was totally unable to negotiate a commercial treaty or to secure the surrender of Detroit and the other western posts; aware of the impotence of the American congress, the British ministry would make no concessions. By an order in council, American vessels were excluded from the trade with the British West Indies; direct trade with Great Britain was subject to important restrictions and American commerce was in a worse condition than it was before the war. The weakness of the confederation, however, made reprisal practically impossible. Adams was of the opinion that better conditions could not be secured until congress had supreme power for the regulation of foreign commerce. Gouverneur Morris was sure that British overbearing would do America "more political good than commercial mischief."

June 1, 1785

July, 1783

The Barbary Pirates

Elsewhere, American overtures were received with almost equal contempt. When the Barbary pirates found that American vessels were no longer under the protection of the British navy, they seized the ships and held their crews for ransom. At this time, the corsairs swept the Mediterranean and successfully defied the European powers. When Adams called upon the Tripolitan minister, the official representative of a policy of piracy and blackmail, the oily-tongued barbarian protested his tender-heartedness and left a doubt as to 1783–1787 whether he was saint or devil. Adams described the conference as a mutual showing of civilities "in a strange mixture of Italian, lingua Franca, broken French, and worse English." In honeyed phrase, Adams was informed that "Turkey, Tripoli, Tunis, and Morocco were the sovereigns of the Mediterranean, and that no nation could navigate that sea without a treaty of peace with them." Thirty thousand guineas for each, "plus a little douceur of £3,000 for himself," were the terms that the astute Mohammedan finally proposed to Adams and Jefferson who had come over from Paris to join in the negotiations. In later years, Adams did not forget the lesson he then learned as to the need of a navy with which to force the pirates to keep the peace without paying them to do so. In 1787, a treaty was arranged with the sultan of Morocco, but the other Barbary powers continued to be hostile.

Spanish Claims

Equally humiliating was our experience with Spain. That country had been greatly dissatisfied with the southern and western boundaries conceded to the United States by England and was determined to keep the Americans from the Gulf of Mexico. In the summer of 1784, the Spanish government informed congress that England had no right to make such generous cessions and declared that, until the territorial limits were fixed, American vessels attempting to navigate the Mississippi would be seized. In the following year, Don Diego de Gardoqui came to Philadelphia as the first Spanish minister and entered into negotiations with Jay, the secretary for foreign affairs. From the American point of view, the settlement of the question was made more urgent by the rapid flow of settlers into what are now Kentucky and Tennessee. These settlers, desiring an outlet for their crops, were anxious for the navigation of the Mississippi, but, content with possession, Gardoqui was inflexible.

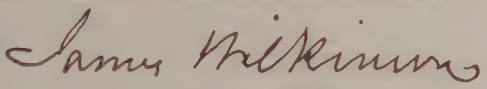

Jay's Proposal

In desperation, Jay suggested to congress that, in consideration of commercial concessions, the United States should give up the navigation of the Mississippi below her boundaries for twenty-five years. The proposal created a great uproar. The New England states, anxious to secure the commercial concessions and caring "little more about the Mississippi River than about Timbuctoo," favored such a treaty, while the backwoodsmen of Kentucky and Tennessee cared as little about the ocean trade but were not going to "sit still while their corn and their pork were confiscated on the way to New Orleans." The people of the southern states sympathized with this pioneer view and opposed the treaty. Patrick Henry is said to have declared that "he would rather part with the confederation than relinquish the navigation of the Mississippi." Some were in favor of extorting their rights from Spain by force of arms. Others, some of whom had been bribed by Spanish gold, plotted to separate the West from the confederation and to unite it with Spain. Chief among these conspirators was James Wilkinson who, though scarcely thirty years of age, "was already well entered on the career of corruption which won him the well-deserved reputation of being the most finished rascal in American annals." From documents recently discovered in the Spanish archives, it appears that, while on a visit to New Orleans, in 1787, Wilkinson renounced his allegiance to the United States and took an oath as a Spanish subject. The separatist plots failed as did Jay's negotiations. Not until the establishment of a more efficient government was Spain brought to a better mind.

1783
1787

The Spanish Conspiracy

Autograph of James Wilkinson

Foreign complications were, however, less dangerous than were domestic discords. As long as the British fleet and army were to be feared, the states lent some support to the common cause. When that danger disappeared, decentralizing tendencies became more manifest. The people of one state knew little of the lives and thoughts of the dwellers in another, a consequence of the geographical extent of the country and of the 1783 1787 methods of communication. It took longer for a New Hampshire man to reach Georgia then than it does for him to reach Alaska now. Most of the people lived and died without ever having seen any state other than their own and, in 1786, Madison wrote: "Of the affairs of Georga I know as little as of those of Kamskatska." Typical conditions of life and lines of thought in one colony differed greatly from those in another colony; the Virginia planter was a very different man from the Massachusetts merchant.

Centrifugal Forces

European Opinion

Because of these forces, it was generally believed in Europe that there could be no abiding union in America. Frederick the Great thought that a republican government could not endure over such an extent of territory. "As to the future grandeur of America, and its being a rising empire under one head, whether republican or monarchical," wrote Josiah Tucker, dean of Gloucester, "it is one of the idlest and most visionary that ever was conceived by writers of romance. . . . A disunited people till the end of time, suspicious and distrustful of each other, they will be divided and subdivided into little commonwealths or principalities." A few years later, Talleyrand called the United States "a giant without bones."

By Way of Illustration

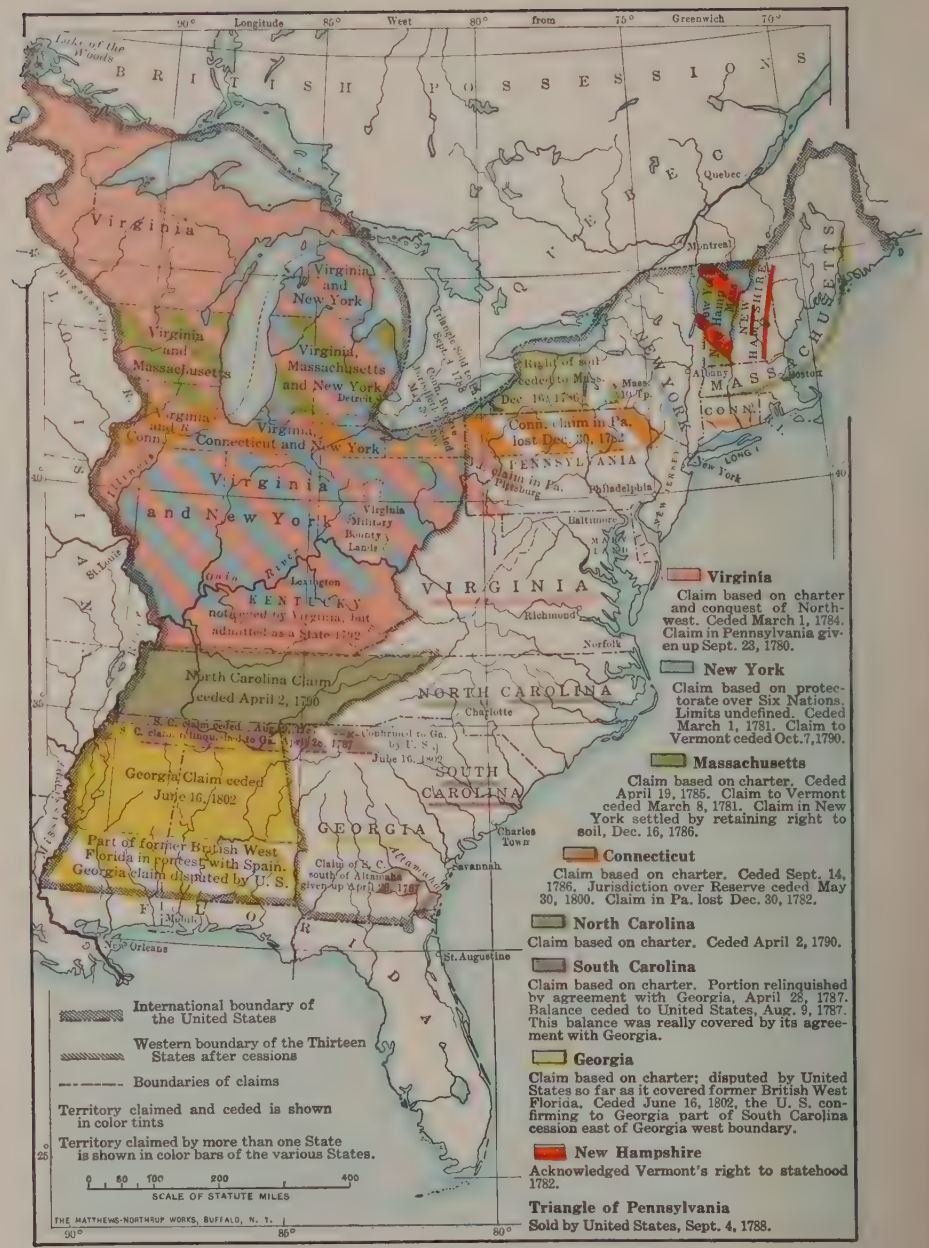

As if to lend color to such opinions, Pennsylvania discriminated against the trade of Delaware and, after the other New England states had adopted retaliatory legislation against British shipping, Connecticut threw open her ports to it and levied duties on imports from Massachusetts. Under the leadership of Governor Clinton, New York levied duties upon goods from New Jersey and Connecticut; New Jersey retaliated by taxing the New York lighthouse on Sandy Hook, and New London business men pledged themselves not to send any firewood or other goods into New York in the year beginning with July, 1787. Between New York and Pennsylvania, New Jersey was compared to a cask tapped at both ends.

Vermont

In 1777, the people of the Green Mountain region had set up an independent state to be called "New Connecticut alias Vermont." Vermont petitioned that she might be ranked "among the free and independent American states and delegates therefrom admitted to seats in the grand Continental congress," but that "grand" body resolved that the action was "highly subversive of the peace and welfare of the United States." Vermont retorted by denying the right of congress to judge of her jurisdiction and declared that, if refused a place among the states, she would consider herself at liberty to make peace or to accept a cessation of hostilities whenever she saw fit. An armed clash between rival factions was narrowly averted and the old hostilities smoldered on — a source of danger throughout the period of the confederation. 1780 1784 June 2, 1780

In the fall of 1782, a federal court upheld the claims of Pennsylvania to the Wyoming valley and Connecticut acquiesced. In 1784, a force of Pennsylvania militia under an officer named Patterson was sent into the valley, ostensibly to restore order but really to drive out the Connecticut settlers in the interest of a company of land speculators. Patterson affected to discover sedition and evicted about one hundred and fifty families, burned their homes, and forced them to leave the valley. The Connecticut men took up arms, blood was shed, and Patterson was besieged. Then John Armstrong, the author of the Newburg Letters, was sent from Philadelphia with a regiment. In the valley he held a conference with the Connecticut men, pledged his honor for their good treatment, and thus persuaded them to lay down their arms. Seventy-six of the victims of misplaced confidence were cast into jail and loaded with pains, indignities, and manacles. The behavior of the Pennsylvania authorities aroused great indignation in Connecticut and war between the two states was threatened. Fortunately, the Pennsylvania council of censors, a peculiar body that assembled once in seven years, condemned Patterson and Armstrong in strong terms and the Penn- Wyoming

MAP OF STATE CLAIMS AND CESSIONS, 1780–1802

(Compiled by David Maydole Matteson, A. M.)

sylvania legislature disavowed their acts and ordered full reparation. 1780–1786

As already related, Maryland long withheld her assent to the articles of confederation because of Virginia's claim to the western lands. In September, 1780, congress urged the cession of such lands for the common benefit of the United States. In March, 1781, New York made such a cession and, in December, 1783, Virginia voted to give up her western empire. In June, 1784, a bill for the cession of what now is Tennessee was introduced in the North Carolina legislature and became a short-lived law. The series of agreements among the competing states and the series of cessions to the general government went on until 1802 when the Georgia cession put an end to the long-continued controversy. State Land Claims and Cessions

Angered by the cession of the land on which they lived to the national government and by the neglect of North Carolina, the people of the region between the Bald Mountains and the Holston River, our old Watauga friends, set up an independent state under the name of Franklin, framed a constitution, elected John Sevier governor, sent a delegate to congress, and asked to be recognized as a separate state. North Carolina repealed her act of cession and adopted other measures for allaying the dissatisfaction. The citizens of the new state split into factions one of which, in 1786, elected delegates to the North Carolina legislature. Two sets of officers claimed authority within the region and a miniature civil war took place. Sevier was arrested for high treason, but was rescued. Later, he sat in the North Carolina senate and, when Tennessee was admitted to the union, he became its first governor. The State of Franklin 1784-85

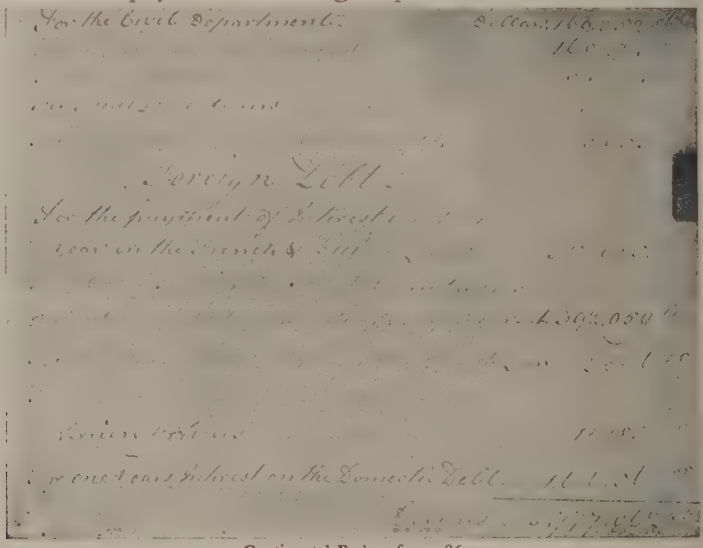

Meanwhile, the financial straits of the confederation grew worse and worse. During the period from the first of November to the first of January, 1786, congress received from requisitions less than two and a half million dollars. The amount received in the last fourteen months of that period was less than half a million Federal Revenues $432,89- 81 dollars, not enough, said a committee of congress, "for the bare maintenance of the federal government on the most economical establishment, and in the time of profound peace." The failure of the states to pay was not due to destitution. The truth is that there was a disinclination to pay taxes; the people were not much more willing to support the government that they had created than the one against which they had rebelled. Each state was afraid that it would pay more than its neighbors and each made the delay of its neighbors the excuse for its own delinquency. "I suspect," wrote Jay to Adams in 1786, "that our posterity will read the history of our last four years with much regret."

1783–1787

The Interest Account

The total income of the government came to be insufficient to pay even running expenses. The arrears of interest on the domestic debt increased from about three million dollars in 1784 to more than eleven millions before the end of 1789; in the same time, the principal of the foreign debt increased more than two million dollars and the arrears of interest from sixty thousand to

Continental Budget for 1786

Spanish Piece of Eight

United States Cent
of 1794

New Jersey Cent of 1788

V

Cut Spanish Coin used during and after the Revolution

"Fugio" Cent
of 1787

Spanish Mexican Pieces

SOME COINS USED DURING
(From collection of the United States Nation

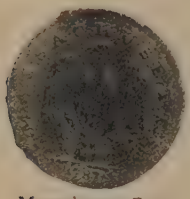

"Nova Constellatio"
Coin used in the United States, 1783 ermont Cent

of 1788

Massachusetts Half-Cent
of 1788

Massachusetts Cent
of 1787

Connecticut Cent
of 1787

THE REVOLUTION
al Museum, Washington, D. C.)

sixteen hundred thousand dollars. Further loans could not be made at home, but some money was obtained abroad. In 1783, France made final loans of more than a million dollars and, from 1784 to 1789, Dutch bankers advanced more than twice that amount. The proceeds of these loans were used for paying interest on the foreign debt, thus keeping the credit of the government abroad better than it was at home. Some assistance was obtained through the Bank of North America, but, in 1784, its connection with the government practically ceased with the retirement of Morris as superintendent of finance. 1783 1789

Monetary System

At the close of the war, owing to European loans and the expenditures made for the British army, there was probably more specie circulating in America than ever before. But when peace came, a large part of the hard money in the country was sent abroad to pay for European goods for which there was a great demand. This drain, joined with unsatisfactory commercial conditions, caused a scarcity of coin and even the little left was astonishing in its variety—doubloons, moidores, pistoles, gold johanneses, guineas, Spanish dollars (the novelists usually call them "pieces of eight"), and almost every other sort of coin struck in any country in the world, all worn, clipped, plugged, or counterfeited. There were also several kinds of depreciated paper money; in some states, the laws made cattle, land, merchandise, and other commodities legal tender and editors were glad to receive salt pork in payment for their papers. Confusion was worse confounded by the fact that terms differed greatly in different states; thus a dollar was worth five shillings in Georgia, six shillings in New England, seven shillings sixpence in Pennsylvania, eight shillings in North Carolina and New York, and thirty-two shillings sixpence in South Carolina.

A Shameful Business

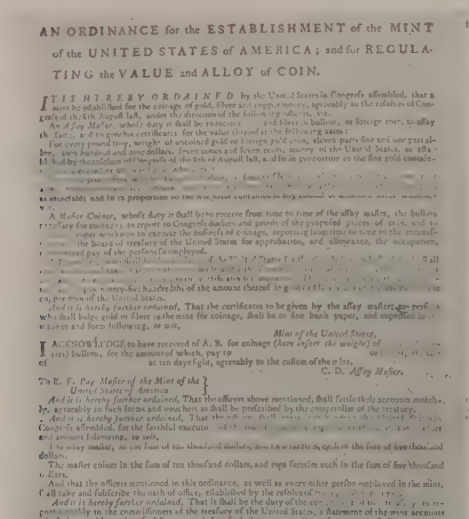

To add still more to the difficulties of the situation, counterfeiting was much practiced, while clipping and shearing good coins was so prevalent that even government agents resorted to it. In 1782, when Timothy

1782 Pickering, the quartermaster-general, was about to pay
1786 out a part of a French subsidy — presumably good coin of full weight — he wrote to another official: "I must trouble you for the necessary apparatus for clipping. 'Tis a shameful business and an unreasonable hardship for a public officer. . . . A pair of good shears, a couple of punches, and a leaden anvil of two or three pounds weight. Will you inquire how the goldsmiths put in their plugs?"

Ten Mills Make One Cent, etc.

In July, 1785, acting upon a report of a committee of which Jefferson was chairman, congress adopted a copper half-penny as the smallest coin, two hundred of which were to be equal to a dollar, and, modifying a plan proposed by Morris, provided that the "several pieces . . . increase in a decimal ratio." A year later, an act was passed providing for an entire national currency, with the mill as the lowest unit of value. Eight different coins, in copper, silver, and gold, were to be struck, but only a few copper cents were put into circulation. Generations of American school boys and business men would have blessed the memory of that committee had it also reformed the systemless system of

August 8, 1786

AN ORDINANCE for the ESTABLISHMENT of the MINT of the UNITED STATES of AMERICA; and for REGULATING the VALUE and ALLOY of COIN.

IT IS HEREBY ORDAINED by the United States in Congress assembled, that a Mint be established for the coinage of gold, silver and copper money, agreeably to the resolves of Congress of the 8th August last, under the direction of the following officers, viz.

An Assay Master, whose duty it shall be to receive . . . and direct in bullion, or foreign coin, to assay the same, & to give such certificates for the value thereof as the following rates:

For every pound troy, weight of uncoined gold or foreign gold coin, eleven parts fine and one part alloy, two hundred and nine dollars, seven cents and seven eighths of a cent, money of the United States, & in like manner for any greater or less proportion of the fine gold contained in any uncoined or foreign gold coin, according to the assay thereof, and so in proportion to the fine gold contained in any national or standard gold coin.

A Master Coiner, whose duty it shall be to receive from time to time of the assay master, the bullion necessary for coinage; to report to Congress dankers and patterns of the proposed pieces of coin, and to procure such moneys as may be wanted for the purposes of coinage, reporting from time to time to the comptroller of the board of treasury of the United States for approbation, and allowance, the occupation, and wages and pay of the persons employed.

. . . shall be one hundredth part of the unit . . . and the . . . shall be one hundredth part of the amount thereof, & so proportionally for the . . . coin, per coin of the United States.

And it is hereby further ordained, That the certificates to be given by the assay master, to persons who shall lodge gold or silver in the mint for coinage, shall be on fine bank paper, and expressed in the manner and form following, to wit, Mint of the United States.

I ACKNOWLEDGE to have received of A. B. for coinage (here insert the weight) of . . . fine bullion, for the amount of which, pay to . . . or order, . . . days after sight, at ten days sight, agreeably to the custom of the mint.

C. D. Assay Master.

To E. F. Pay Master of the Mint of the United States of America.

And it is hereby further ordained, That the officers above mentioned, shall settle their accounts monthly, agreeably to such forms and vouchers as shall be prescribed by the comptroller of the treasury.

And it is hereby further ordained, That the . . . shall annually . . . to Congress assembled, for the faithful execution . . . and amount following, to wit,

The assay master, . . . sum of ten thousand dollars; the master coiner . . . to exceed the sum of five thousand dollars.

The master coiner in the sum of ten thousand dollars, and two sureties each in the sum of five thousand dollars.

And that the officers mentioned in this ordinance, as well as every other person employed in the mint, shall take and subscribe the oath of office, established by the resolves of . . . 1784.

And it is hereby further ordained, That it shall be the duty of the comptroller . . . to report monthly to the commissioners of the treasury of the United States, a statement of the mint accounts adjusted agreeably to the usual forms; and if on such statement or other information it shall appear, that there has been any neglect, mismanagement or abuse of trust, in any of the officers mentioned in the within ordinance, it shall be the duty of the commissioners of the board of treasury to suspend such officer or officers, and to report thereon specially to Congress.

And it is hereby further ordained, That the copper coin struck under the authority of the United States in Congress assembled, shall be receivable in all taxes, or payments due to the United States, in the proportion of five dollars for every hundred dollars so paid; but that no other copper coin whatsoever, shall be receiveable in any taxes or payments whatsoever to the United States.

And whereas, The great quantities of base copper coin daily imported into . . . declared to be by the several states, is become so highly injurious to the interest and commerce of the . . . as to require the immediate interposition of the powers vested by the confederation in the United States in Congress assembled to forbid the coining the like of copper, the coin so current as aforesaid.

Be it therefore, &c. . . . That no copper coin whatsoever, . . . after the 1st day of . . . 1787, . . . shall be current . . . And that all copper in the United States shall pass at a proportionable value, and that no . . . at a greater value than one federal dollar for two pounds and one quarter of a pound avoirdupois weight of such copper coin.

DONE by the United States in Congress assembled, the fifteenth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty six, and of the sovereignty and independence the eleventh.

Ordinance for the Establishment of a Mint weights and measures by putting it upon a decimal basis. 1785–1788

The lack of money, the distress of debtors many of whom were forced to languish in vile prisons, and a general spirit of unrest and discontent joined to produce, in the years of 1785–86, a wide-spread craze for paper money. A leveling spirit was abroad and there was much preaching about "equality and justice." The movement had a political as well as an economic significance and the contest was fought out in every state. In Rhode Island, New Jersey, New York, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia the issue of paper money was authorized. What is Money?

The movement came to its climax in Rhode Island where, in spite of the experience of the merchants and tradesmen of the larger towns, the populace and especially the farmers still believed in "the doctrine of the political transubstantiation of paper into gold and silver," and carried the election in which the question was at issue. In the spring of 1786, the Rhode Island legislature ordered the emission of one hundred thousand paper pounds to be loaned to the freeholders of the state on security of landed property of twice the value received. When Rhode Island merchants refused to accept the "money" at its face value, the legislature decreed that such offenders should be liable to a fine of one hundred pounds and to the loss of rights as freemen. Then the city merchants raised their prices and finally closed their shops and thus brought business to a standstill. The farmers attempted to starve the city dwellers into submission by withholding supplies and riots followed. Finally, the case of a Newport butcher who refused to take the paper except at a heavy discount came to trial before the superior court. In spite of strong popular pressure, the judges held that the force act was unconstitutional. In the following May, four of the five judges were removed. The legislature passed a new forcing act, but the tide had begun to turn and most of the towns refused to ratify it. By Novem- In Rhode Island 1783 1786 ber, the Rhode Island paper dollar passed for only sixteen cents in coin.

September, 1786

In Massachusetts

In Massachusetts the pressure of debts was greatly felt, especially in the western districts. Taxes were high, money was scarce, and the legislature was petitioned for the popular panacea. Feeling was intense against the rich merchants of Boston, the judges, and most of all against the lawyers who were denounced as blood-suckers, pickpockets, and smooth-tongued rogues. The legislature, however, remorselessly voted down bills for establishing a paper currency, for making real and personal property a legal tender, and, early in July, 1786, adjourned without having even abated the lawyers.

A Premonitory Paroxysm

August-September

In August, a convention of thirty-seven towns in Worcester County and another of fifty towns at Hatfield in Hampshire County voiced the popular demands. At Northampton, Worcester, Concord, and elsewhere the courts were broken up by mobs. One of the leaders of the Concord mob was Job Shattuck who made a fierce harangue in which he declared that the time had come for cancelling all debt. Governor Bowdoin sent six hundred militia to protect the supreme court at Springfield, but an armed mob under the leadership of Daniel Shays, a former captain in the continental army, intimidated the militia and forced the court to adjourn. Fresh riots followed and Shays with a large force of insurgents took possession of Worcester.

Promissory Note signed by Daniel Shays

Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

By His Excellency

JAMES BOWDOIN, Esquire,

Governour of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

AN ADDRESS,

To the good People of the Commonwealth.

A [illegible] Commonwealth, in the connection of its subordinate [illegible] and the [illegible] Commonwealth, and of the [illegible] Parliament, and the General Court.

But relief was not the only object, upon which the General Court [illegible] and of [illegible] the outrages, which had been committed [illegible] and [illegible] of the Legislature, which had been [illegible] and [illegible] Governour, [illegible] and [illegible] Council, before the [illegible] Legislature [illegible] the insurrections; and the insurgents were [illegible] in the most serious and [illegible]

[illegible] give themselves [illegible] But, what have [illegible] The measures [illegible] Insurgents have [illegible] the Justices [illegible] Courts and Treasurer [illegible] that the Government is [illegible] open defiance; and that the laws [illegible] these Counties, [illegible] prostrate.

By a resolve of the said General Court, the Legislature reposed their [illegible] confidence, that the Governour would persevere in the exercise of the powers vested in him by the Constitution, for enforcing due obedience to the authority and laws of Government; and for preventing any attempts to interrupt the course of law and justice, upon which the peace and safety of the Commonwealth [illegible] essentially depend.

In the present dangerous and critical situation of affairs, I feel myself confirmed, by the most sacred obligations of duty, and for the purposes intended by the Legislature, to call those powers into immediate exercise, for the protection of the Commonwealth, and the prompt suppression of those who have engaged in its destruction, treason, detriment or annoyance. And I have accordingly, pursuant to my own ideas of duty, as well as the expectations of the General Court, ordered a part of the Militia to assemble in arms, for the purpose of protecting the Judicial Courts next to be holden in the County of Worcester; of aiding the Civil Magistrate to execute the laws; of repelling all insurgents against the Government; and for apprehending all disturbers of the public peace.

It is now become evident, that the object of the insurgents is to annihilate our present happy constitution, or to force the General Court into measures repugnant to every [illegible] of justice, good faith, and national policy.

And those who encourage, or in any way assist them, either individually, or in a corporate capacity, do partake of their guilt; and are legally responsible for it.

[illegible] ent will have so decided a [illegible] put an end to the present [illegible] and restore a regular administration, without the horrors of bloodshed.

[illegible] Just faith, [illegible] deeds and freedom, [illegible] bine for defence, and meet force with force: or voluntarily and ingloriously relinquish the blessings without which life would cease to be desirable; and which, by the laws of God and Nature ought never to be tamely surrendered.

What would be the end of such resolve, is known only to Him, who can open the volume and read the pages of futurity.

Strongly impressed with the truth of these ideas, I must conjure the good people of the Commonwealth, as they value life and the enjoyments of it, as they regard their own characters, and the dignity of human nature, to summon up every virtuous principle within them, and to co-operate with Government in every necessary exertion, for restoring to the Commonwealth its former harmony and peace, upon which [illegible] essentially depend.

GIVEN at the COUNCIL-CHAMBER, in BOSTON, the 12th day of JANUARY, 1787; and in the eleventh year of the INDEPENDENCE of the UNITED STATES of AMERICA.

James Bowdoin.

By His Excellency's command,

John Avery, jun. Sec.

[Published By Authority.]

GOVERNOR BOWDOIN'S PROCLAMATION, JANUARY 12, 1787

1786
1787
The Shays Rebellion

The state now took decisive measures. The writ of habeas corpus was suspended and a force of four thousand four hundred men was put under the command of General Lincoln. Meanwhile, the rebels had evacuated Worcester and marched to Springfield to secure the arms in the federal arsenal there. General William Shepard with a force of militia successfully defended the place and the insurgents retreated by way of Ludlow and Pelham to Petersham. By an all-night march through the snow, Lincoln surprised them on the early morning of the fourth of February and captured Shays and about one hundred and fifty of his men. Many of the rebels fled to the adjoining states; those who took refuge in Vermont and Rhode Island were protected. Later in the month, Lincoln suppressed disorders in the Hampshire mountain region and the Shays rebellion was at an end. Fourteen of the ringleaders were condemned to death as traitors, but sympathy for them was strong and they were pardoned by Governor Hancock.

January 25, 1787

The Confederation in Contempt

Just before the capture of Shays, when it was proposed to call on congress for assistance, it was argued that it would be incompatible with the dignity of the old Bay State to allow federal troops to set foot upon her soil and the resolution was rejected. Although the arsenal at Springfield belonged to the confederation and the federal government was bound to help the state, congress did not dare to take any open steps towards suppressing the movement. Under pretense that troops were needed for an expedition against the northwestern Indians, congress did, however, in October, 1786, call upon the states for a continental force. It also made the astounding entry in its secret journals that it "would not hazard the perilous step of putting arms into the hands of men whose fidelity must in some degree depend on the faithful payment of their wages, and had not they the fullest confidence . . . of the most liberal exertions of the money holders in the state of Massachusetts and the other states in filling the loans authorized by the resolve of this date." Confession of impotence could not go further! 1786 1787

The Needed Lesson

December 26, 1786

The Shays rebellion opened men's eyes to the necessity of a more stable government. From Mount Vernon, Washington wrote: "I feel, my dear General Knox, infinitely more than I can express to you, for the disorders which have arisen in these States. Good God! Who, besides a Tory, could have foreseen, or a Briton predicted them? . . . There are combustibles in every State which a spark might set fire to." "We find that we are men," wrote Knox, " . . . men possessing all the turbulent passions belonging to that animal, and that we must have a government proper and adequate for him." Thus the Shays rebellion served as a needed lesson. Necessity alone could overcome prejudices, hostilities, and other obstacles to a more perfect union. Now, "things had come to such a pass that people of all shades of opinion were beginning to agree upon one thing,—that something must be done and done quickly." Meantime, England was looking on in wonder "that such a miserable shadow had frightened her into such a peace."

CHAPTER XIX

OPENING THE WEST; THE ORDINANCE OF 1787

I hear the tread of pioneers
Of nations yet to be,
The first low wash of waves, where soon
Shall roil a human sea.

IN the critical period that we have been studying, the United States acquired a domain in which its thirteen members had a common interest—an event the full significance of which was little understood. Without some knowledge of the story of this ultra-montane empire that England had yielded to the United States, one cannot understand how our federal union came to be.

The Claimant States

As already explained, there were conflicting claims to the territory between the mountains and the Mississippi. By virtue of her ancient charter modified by the existence of New York, Massachusetts claimed what is now the southern part of Michigan and Wisconsin. By the same token, Connecticut claimed a narrow strip along the northern borders of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. Because of her oft-acknowledged suzerainty over the Iroquois and their vassal tribes, New York claimed everything north of the Ohio River and east of the Miami (Wabash). Building on the famous "west and northwest" clause of her charter of 1609, Virginia claimed nearly all of the uncarved territory and, thanks to the enterprise and genius of George Rogers Clark, held the traditionary nine points in law by actual possession, witnessed by Virginia garrisons at Cahokia, Kaskaskia, and Vincennes. Then, too, there were the western claims of Georgia and the Carolinas. 1763 1781

A Path-breaking Idea

While war was being waged and in spite of the king's proclamation of 1763, a human tide was pouring into this back country; "the paths that the deer had made over the mountains could not be blocked up. The hunter followed the deer and the settler followed the hunter," as narrated in the tenth chapter of the fifth volume of this history. At the same time, the states that had fixed western boundaries dreaded domination and future tyranny if claims like those of Virginia and New York were maintained. For such reasons, Maryland had held up the articles of confederation until she was assured that the western lands should become common property "subject to be parcelled out by congress into free, convenient, and independent governments." This was a perilous cutting away from the almost universal notion of supreme state sovereignty, the first expression of an idea that has overwhelmed the theory of union on which the articles of confederation were based. The indignation thus aroused was so fierce that some were in favor of dividing Maryland between the neighboring states and erasing her name from the map. But Maryland's attitude was firm and her action came at the decisive moment.

Gift and Promise

Early in 1780, New York agreed to give up her claims to lands west of a north and south line drawn through the western end of Lake Ontario; in September of that year, congress urged similar action upon the other six claimant states and, in October, resolved that all lands thus ceded should be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States and organized into new states that should become "members of the federal union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom and independence as the other states." Connecticut promised a cession of her lands and Virginia expressed a willingness to yield title to her territory north and west of the Ohio River. The new principle had won general acceptance, Maryland entered into the

January, 1781

1782 confederation as already told, and, in 1782, congress
1802 accepted the New York cession.

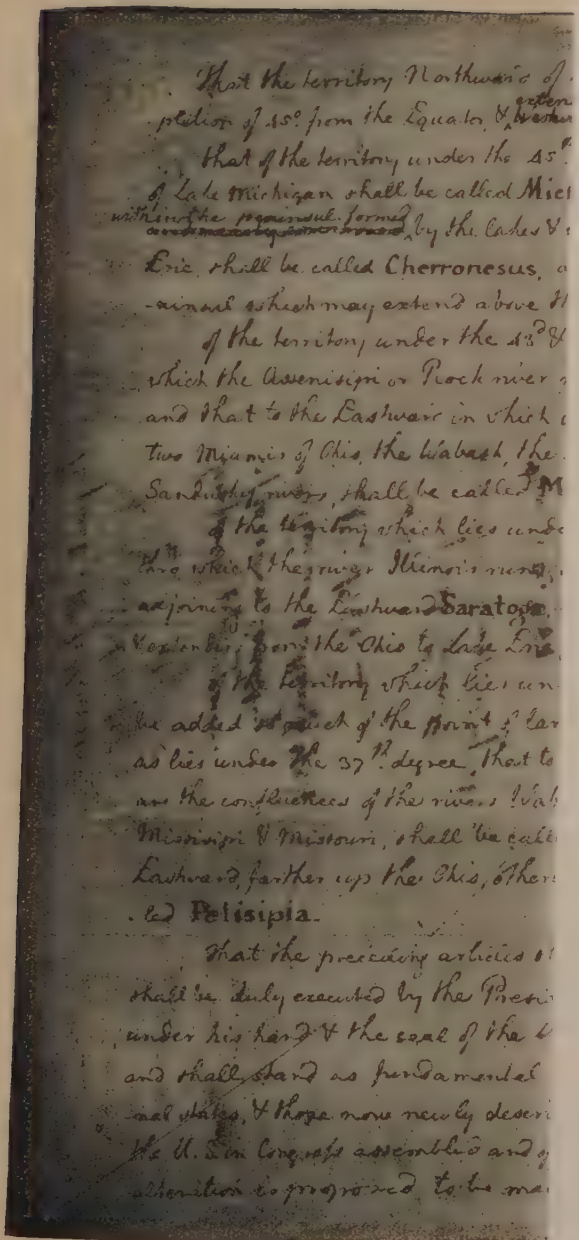

The Old Northwest

Virginia's first offer was accompanied by conditions that congress refused to accept, but, in 1784, with a conditional reservation of military bounty lands between the Scioto and the Little Miami rivers, she ceded her territory north and west of the Ohio River; in 1792, her territory south of the Ohio was admitted to the Union as the state of Kentucky. On the tenth Lexington and Concord anniversary, Massachusetts gave up her claims to lands west of New York. The decision of the federal court concerning the Wyoming region had left soreness in Connecticut, but, in 1786, that state ceded to the general government all of her lands west of a meridian line "one hundred and twenty miles west of the western boundary line of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania," thus reserving to herself what is now the northeastern part of Ohio. In 1800, she surrendered to the United States the jurisdiction over this famous "Western Reserve." South of the Ohio, South Carolina ceded her twelve-mile strip in 1787, North Carolina renewed her cession in 1790, but Georgia did not give up her claim until 1802. By the Fort Stanwix treaty of 1768 and that of October, 1784, the Iroquois alienated all their interests in the Northwest. In January, 1785, United States commissioners concluded a treaty at Fort McIntosh (Beaver, Pennsylvania) with some of the western tribes, the first of a long series by which congress was put in possession of practically all the lands ceded by the claimant states. No other "acts of the Congress of the Confederation evinced so genuine a national spirit as those by which it exceeded its powers and accepted and prepared to govern and dispose of this splendid common property."

April 19, 1785

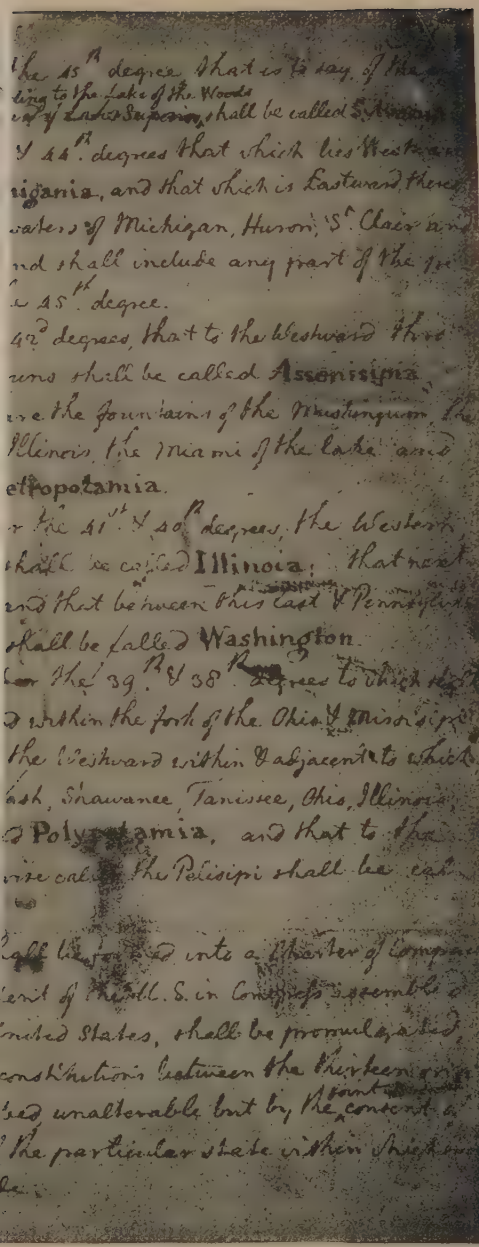

A Buffer Colony Proposed

Even before any of the states had surrendered their claims to the western territory, congress offered bounties of land therein to those who would enlist in the Revolutionary army. After the coming of peace, nearly three hundred of the officers in the continental line who

That the territory Northwest of plation of 45° from the Equator, & extend That of the territory under the 45th of Lake Michigan shall be called Mich within the meridional former by the Lakes &
Erie, shall be called Cherronesus, a
-ainant which may extend above of the territory under the 43d & which the Assenisipi or Rock river and that to the Eastward in which two Miamis of Ohio, the Wabash, the Sandusky rivers, shall be called M of the territory which lies under the river Illinois runn adjoining to the Eastward Saratoga, Westerly, from the Ohio to Lake Eri of the territory which lies un be added to that of the Point of Lar as lies under the 37th degree. That to are the confluences of the rivers Wab
Missisipi & Missouri, shall be call Eastward farther up the Ohio, Ther
-led Pelisipia.
That the preceding articles shall be duly executed by the Presi under his hand & the seal of the U and shall stand as fundamental said states, & those now newly deseri the U. in Congress assembled and alteration to progress to the ma

A Page of Jefferson's Plan fo
Northwest T
(From the original in possession of Colonel Clare the 45th degree. That is to say. of the ing to the Lake of the Woods ay of Lake Superior, shall be called Sylvania & 46th. degrees that which lies Westward igania, and that which is Eastward there waters of Michigan, Huron, St. Clair and nd shall include any part of the na e 45th. degree.

42d degrees, that to the Westward three ons shall be called Assenisipia ve the fountains of the Muskingum, the Illinois, the Miami of the Lake and etropotamia.
the 41st. & 40th degrees, the Western shall be called Illinoia. That next and that between this east & Pennsylvania shall be called Washington.
the 39th. & 38th. degrees to which the d within the fork of the Ohio & Missisipi the Westward within & adjacent to which ash, Shawanee, Tanissee, Ohio, Illinois, d Polypotamia, and that to the ive called the Pelisipi shall be call ight be laid into a Charter of Compact ent of the U. S. in Congress assembled & United States, shall be promulgated, constitution between the thirteen origi ed unalterable but by the consent of the particular State within which such be

R THE ORGANIZATION OF THE ERRITORY nce Monroe Burton, of Detroit, Michigan) were about to exchange the hardships of war for the sufferings of poverty petitioned congress to mark out a district between Lake Erie and the Ohio River as the seat of a new colony "in time to be admitted one of the confederated States of America" and to set off their bounty lands therein, but nothing came directly of the project. 1783 1784 Newburg, June 16, 1783

In October, 1783, before it received undisputed title to any of the western domain, congress had appointed a committee of which Jefferson was chairman to consider the government of the territory in question. On the day on which Virginia completed her act of cession, Jefferson reported an ordinance providing for the dividing into districts all the western lands "ceded or to be ceded." The boundaries then proposed fix the limits of no commonwealth today and it is with a feeling of relief that we turn from a vain search on a modern map for such state names as Michigania, Chersonesus, Assenisipia, Metropotamia, Illionoia, Polypotamia, and Pelesipia. With the names and boundaries was reported a code of laws for the government of the proposed territories, each of which was to be allowed to form a "temporary government" when it had twenty thousand free inhabitants and might be admitted to the Union by congress when it had as many inhabitants as the least populous of the original thirteen. The new states were to have republican forms of government, pay their respective shares of the public debt, and remain forever component parts of the United States. One of the articles provided that, after the year 1800, "there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude . . . otherwise than in punishment for crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted to have been personally guilty." The ordinance was sent back to the committee, the clause prohibiting slavery was eliminated, the pedantic names were dropped, some of the boundaries were changed, and other amendments were made. The reformed ordinance was adopted on the twenty-third of April, 1784; it did not organize a The Ordinance of 1784 March 1, 1784

MAP OF PROPOSED STATES IN THE WEST, 1777–1786
(Prepared by David Maydole Matteson, A. M.)

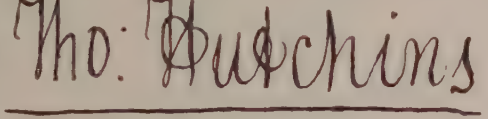

territorial government and soon became a nullity. But the Jeffersonian policy of making slavery sectional and freedom national was not to be permitted thus to die. 1785

Two Basic Ideas

It was not to be expected that England or Spain would long allow two hundred thousand square miles of rich virgin soil to remain unpeopled, and congress was under obligation to provide for settlement. With a great war debt, a worthless currency, and an extinct national credit, the idea of a revenue from the sale of the western lands was "very comforting." But if the ceded domain was to become a source of revenue there was need of a system of surveys unknown in colonial days. Hence the land ordinance of the twentieth of May, 1785, which combined the two ideas of settlement and revenue.

The First United States Land Survey

Thomas Hutchins was then geographer of the United States, an office that came to include the duties of surveyor-general of the public lands. The first survey was to begin at the point where the western boundary of Pennsylvania intersects the northern bank of the Ohio River. From this point, a base line, known as the Geographer's Line, was to be run due west. North and south lines six miles apart were to divide the territory into seven ranges, and east and west lines six miles apart were to divide each range into townships. Each township was to be divided into thirty-six lots (subsequently called sections) each one mile square. Lot sixteen of each township was to be reserved for the maintenance of public schools within that township and reservations were to be made for the Christian Indians and for patriot refugees from Canada and Nova Scotia. The remaining lands were to be sold at auction for not less than one dollar an acre (specie value) and the cost of surveying. Before any lands were sold under this system, congress had authorized the sale of large tracts at much lower prices to land companies or syndicates.

Autograph of Thomas Hutchins

1786 On the thirtieth of September, Hutchins began operations, but not much of the work was completed that year. The ordinance contemplated a survey of seven ranges extending northward from the Ohio River to Lake Erie. The ranges were numbered from east to west and the townships in each range were numbered from south to north. In 1786, Connecticut ceded to the general government her western lands reserving a tract in what is now northeastern Ohio. Owing probably to unsettled questions relating to this Western Reserve, the continental congress, by a resolution dated the ninth of May, 1786, directed that Hutchins and his surveyors "do not proceed further northerly than the east and west line mentioned in the said ordinance," i. e., the Geographer's Line. Hutchins died in 1789, and, under an act of 1796, Rufus Putnam became the first surveyor-general. By item eight of instructions issued by Oliver Wolcott, secretary of the treasury, Putnam was directed to complete the survey of the lands "between the Southern boundary of the Connecticut Claims [the forty-first parallel] & the Seven Ranges of Townships which were surveyed in pursuance of an ordinance of Congress under the late Confederation passed on the 20th of May, 1785." In accordance with these instructions, Putnam had the four tiers of townships between the seven ranges and the military lands on the south and the southern boundary of the Western Reserve on the north, and extending as far westward as the Muskingum River, thirty-eight townships in all, surveyed in 1800. The thirty-six sections in each township of the old seven ranges are numbered consecutively from the southeast corner of the township while those of the townships surveyed by Putnam north of Hutchins's base line are similarly numbered from the northeast corner, a system that is still maintained in the survey of the public lands. The original manuscript returns of this survey are preserved in the general land office at Washington City. They are without date, but, as they mention an act of May,

The Seven Ranges

March 14, 1797

An ORDINANCE for the GOVERNMENT of the TERRITORY of the UNITED STATES, North-West of the RIVER OHIO.

BE IT ORDAINED by the United States in Congress assembled, That the said territory, for the purposes of temporary government, be one district; subject, however, to be divided into two districts, as future circumstances may, in the opinion of Congress, make it expedient.

Be it ordained by the authority aforesaid, That the estates both of resident and non-resident proprietors in the said territory, dying intestate, shall descend to, and be distributed among their children, and the descendants of a deceased child in equal parts; the descendants of a deceased child or grand-child, to take the shares of their deceased parent in equal parts among them: And where there shall be no children or descendants, then in equal parts to the next of kin, in equal degrees; and among collaterals, the children of a deceased brother or sister of the intestate, shall have in equal parts among them their deceased parents share; and there shall in no case be a distinction between kindred of the whole and half blood; saving to all cases to the widow of the intestate, her third part of the real estate for life, and one third part of the personal estate; and this law relative to descents and dower, shall remain in full force until altered by the legislature of the district. ——— And until the governor and judges shall adopt laws as herein after mentioned, estates in the said territory may be devised or bequeathed by wills in writing, signed and sealed by him or her, in whom the estate may be, (being of full age) and attested by three witnesses; ——— and real estates may be conveyed by lease and release, or bargain and sale, signed, sealed, and delivered by the person being of full age, in whom the estate may be, and attested by two witnesses, provided such wills be duly proved, and such conveyances be acknowledged, or the execution thereof duly proved, and be recorded within one year after proper magistrates, courts, and registers shall be appointed for that purpose; and personal property may be transferred by delivery, saving, however, to the French and Canadian inhabitants, and other settlers of the Kaskaskies, Saint Vincent's, and the neighbouring villages, who have heretofore professed themselves citizens of Virginia, their laws and customs now in force among them, relative to the descent and conveyance of property.

Be it ordained by the authority aforesaid, That there shall be appointed from time to time, by Congress, a governor, whose commission shall continue in force for the term of three years, unless sooner revoked by Congress; he shall reside in the district, and have a freehold estate therein, in one thousand acres of land, while in the exercise of his office.

There shall be appointed from time to time, by Congress, a secretary, whose commission shall continue in force for four years, unless sooner revoked, he shall reside in the district, and have a freehold estate therein, in five hundred acres of land, while in the exercise of his office; it shall be his duty to keep and preserve the acts and laws passed by the legislature, and the public records of the district, and the proceedings of the governor in his executive department; and transmit authentic copies of such acts and proceedings, every six months, to the secretary of Congress: There shall also be appointed a court to consist of three judges, any two of whom to form a court, who shall have a common law jurisdiction, and reside in the district, and have each therein a freehold estate in five hundred acres of land, while in the exercise of their offices; and their commissions shall continue in force during good behaviour.

The governor and judges, or a majority of them, shall adopt and publish in the district, such laws of the original states, criminal and civil, as may be necessary, and best suited to the circumstances of the district, and report them to Congress, from time to time, which laws shall be in force in the district until the organization of the general assembly therein, unless disapproved of by Congress; but afterwards the legislature shall have authority to alter them as they shall think fit.

The governor for the time being, shall be commander in chief of the militia, appoint and commission all officers in the same, below the rank of general officers; all general officers shall be appointed and commissioned by Congress.

Previous to the organization of the general assembly, the governor shall appoint such magistrates and other civil officers, in each county or township, as he shall find necessary for the preservation of the peace and good order in the same. After the general assembly shall be organized, the powers and duties of magistrates and other civil officers shall be regulated and defined by the said assembly; but all magistrates and other civil officers, not herein otherwise directed, shall, during the continuance of this temporary government, be appointed by the governor.

For the prevention of crimes and injuries, the laws to be adopted or made shall have force in all parts of the district, and for the execution of process, criminal and civil, the governor shall make proper divisions thereof——and he shall proceed from time to time, as circumstances may require, to lay out the parts of the district in which the Indian titles shall have been extinguished, into counties and townships, subject, however, to such alterations as may thereafter be made by the legislature.

So soon as there shall be five thousand free male inhabitants, of full age, in the district, upon giving proof thereof to the governor, they shall receive authority, with time and place, to elect representatives from their counties or townships, to represent them in the general assembly; provided that for every five hundred free male inhabitants there shall be one representative, and so on progressively with the number of free male inhabitants, shall the right of representation increase, until the number of representatives shall amount to twenty-five, after which the number and proportion of representatives shall be regulated by the legislature: provided that no person be eligible or qualified to act as a representative, unless he shall have been a citizen of one of the United States three years, and be a resident in the district, or unless he shall have resided in the district three years, and in either case shall likewise hold in his own right, in fee simple, two hundred acres of land within the same——Provided also, that a freehold in fifty acres of land in the district, having been a citizen of one of the states, and being resident in the district, or the like freehold and two years residence in the district shall be necessary to qualify a man as an elector of a representative.

The representatives thus elected, shall serve for the term of two years, and in case of the death of a representative, or removal from office, the governor shall issue a writ to the county or township for which he was a member, to elect another in his stead, to serve for the residue of the term.

The general assembly, or legislature, shall consist of the governor, legislative council, and a house of representatives. The legislative council shall consist of five members, to continue in office five years, unless sooner removed by Congress, any three of whom to be a quorum, and the members of the council shall be nominated and appointed in the following manner, to wit: As soon as representatives shall be elected, the governor shall appoint a time and place for them to meet together, and, when met, they shall nominate ten persons, residents in the district, and each possessed of a freehold in five hundred acres of land, and return their names to Congress; five of whom Congress shall appoint and commission to serve as aforesaid, and whenever a vacancy shall happen in the council, by death or removal from office, the house of representatives shall nominate two persons, qualified as aforesaid, for each vacancy, and return their names to Congress, one of whom Congress shall appoint and commission for the residue of the term; and every five years, four months after the expiration of the time of service of the members of council, the said house shall nominate ten persons, qualified as aforesaid, and return their names to Congress, five of whom Congress shall appoint and commission to serve as members of the council five years, unless sooner removed. And the governor, legislative council, and house of re-

THE ORDINANCE

(From a printed copy in the New York Pub

perſentatives, ſhall have authority to make laws in all caſes for the good government of the diſtrict, not repugnant to the principles and articles in this ordinance eſtabliſhed and declared. And all bills having paſſed by a majority in the houſe, and by a majority in the council, ſhall be referred to the governor for his aſſent; but no bill or legiſlative act whatever, ſhall be of any force without his aſſent. The governor ſhall have power to convene, prorogue and diſſolve the general aſſembly, when in his opinion it ſhall be expedient.

The governor, judges, legiſlative council, ſecretary, and ſuch other officers as Congreſs ſhall appoint in the diſtrict, ſhall take an oath or affirmation of fidelity, and of office, the governor before the preſident of Congreſs, and all other officers before the governor. As ſoon as a legiſlature ſhall be formed in the diſtrict, the council and houſe, aſſembled in one room, ſhall have authority by joint ballot to elect a delegate to Congreſs, who ſhall have a ſeat in Congreſs, with a right of debating, but not of voting, during this temporary government.

And for extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, which form the baſis whereon theſe republics, their laws and conſtitutions are erected; to fix and eſtabliſh thoſe principles as the baſis of all laws, conſtitutions and governments, which forever hereafter ſhall be formed in the ſaid territory;—to provide alſo for the eſtabliſhment of ſtates, and permanent government therein, and for their admiſſion to a ſhare in the federal councils on an equal footing with the original ſtates, at as early periods as may be conſiſtent with the general intereſt:

It is hereby ordained and declared by the authority aforeſaid, That the following articles ſhall be conſidered as articles of compact between the original ſtates and the people and ſtates in the ſaid territory, and forever remain unalterable, unleſs by common conſent, to wit:

Article the Firſt. No perſon, demeaning himſelf in a peaceable and orderly manner, ſhall ever be moleſted on account of his mode of worſhip or religious ſentiments in the ſaid territory.

Article the Second. The inhabitants of the ſaid territory ſhall always be entitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, and of the trial by jury; of a proportionate repreſentation of the people in the legiſlature, and of judicial proceedings according to the courſe of the common law: all perſons ſhall be bailable unleſs for capital offences, where the proof ſhall be evident, or the preſumption great; all fines ſhall be moderate, and no cruel or unuſual puniſhments ſhall be inflicted; no man ſhall be deprived of his liberty or property but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land; and ſhould the public exigencies make it neceſſary for the common preſervation to take any perſon's property, or to demand his particular ſervices, full compenſation ſhall be made for the ſame;—and in the juſt preſervation of rights and property it is underſtood and declared, that no law ought ever to be made, or have force in the ſaid territory, that ſhall in any manner whatever interfere with, or affect private contracts or engagements, bona fide and without fraud previouſly formed.

Article the Third. Religion, morality and knowledge, being neceſſary to good government and the happineſs of mankind, ſchools and the means of education ſhall forever be encouraged. The utmoſt good faith ſhall always be obſerved towards the Indians; their lands and property ſhall never be taken from them without their conſent; and in their property, rights and liberty, they never ſhall be invaded or diſturbed, unleſs in juſt and lawful wars authoriſed by Congreſs; but laws founded in juſtice and humanity ſhall from time to time be made, for preventing wrongs being done to them, and for preſerving peace and friendſhip with them.

Article the Fourth. The ſaid territory, and the ſtates which may be formed therein, ſhall forever remain a part of this confederacy of the United States of America, ſubject to the articles of confederation, and to ſuch alterations therein as ſhall be conſtitutionally made; and to all the acts and ordinances of the United ſtates in Congreſs aſſembled, conformable thereto. The inhabitants and ſettlers in the ſaid territory, ſhall be ſubject to pay a part of the federal debts contracted or to be contracted, and a proportional part of the expences of government, to be apportioned on them by Congreſs, according to the ſame common rule and meaſure by which apportionments thereof ſhall be made on the other ſtates; and the taxes for paying their proportion, ſhall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the legiſlatures of the diſtricts or diſtricts or new ſtates, as in the original ſtates, within the time agreed upon by the United States in Congreſs aſſembled. The legiſlatures of thoſe diſtricts, or new ſtates, ſhall never interfere with the primary diſpoſal of the ſoil by the United States in Congreſs aſſembled, nor with any regulations Congreſs may find neceſſary for ſecuring the title in ſuch ſoil to the bona fide purchaſers. No tax ſhall be impoſed on lands the property of the United States; and in no caſe ſhall non-reſident proprietors be taxed higher than reſidents. The navigable waters leading into the Miſſiſippi and St. Lawrence, and the carrying places between the ſame ſhall be common highways, and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the ſaid territory, as to the citizens of the United States, and thoſe of any other ſtates that may be admitted into the confederacy, without any tax, impoſt or duty therefor.

Article the Fifth. There ſhall be formed in the ſaid territory, not leſs than three nor more than five ſtates; and the boundaries of the ſtates, as ſoon as Virginia ſhall alter her act of ceſſion and conſent to the ſame, ſhall become fixed and eſtabliſhed as follows, to wit: The weſtern ſtate in the ſaid territory, ſhall be bounded by the Miſſiſippi, the Ohio and Wabaſh rivers; a direct line drawn from the Wabaſh and Poſt Vincent's due north to the territorial line between the United States and Canada, and by the ſaid territorial line to the lake of the Woods and Miſſiſippi. The middle ſtate ſhall be bounded by the ſaid direct line, the Wabaſh from Poſt Vincent's to the Ohio; by the Ohio, by a direct line drawn due north from the mouth of the Great Miami to the ſaid territorial line, and by the ſaid territorial line. The eaſtern ſtate ſhall be bounded by the laſt mentioned direct line, the Ohio, Pennſylvania, and the ſaid territorial line: Provided however, and it is further underſtood and declared, that the boundaries of theſe three ſtates, ſhall be ſubject ſo far to be altered, that if Congreſs ſhall hereafter find it expedient, they ſhall have authority to form one or two ſtates in that part of the ſaid territory which lies north of an eaſt and weſt line drawn through the ſouthern bend or extreme of lake Michigan; and whenever any of the ſaid ſtates ſhall have ſixty thouſand free inhabitants therein, ſuch ſtate ſhall be admitted by its delegates into the Congreſs of the United ſtates, on an equal footing with the original ſtates in all reſpects whatever; and ſhall be at liberty to form a permanent conſtitution and ſtate government: Provided the conſtitution and government ſo to be formed, ſhall be republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in theſe articles; and ſo far as it can be conſiſtent with the general intereſt of the confederacy, ſuch admiſſion ſhall be allowed at an earlier period, and when there may be a leſs number of free inhabitants in the ſtate than ſixty thouſand.

Article the Sixth. There ſhall be neither ſlavery nor involuntary ſervitude in the ſaid territory, otherwiſe than in puniſhment of crimes whereof the party ſhall have been duly convicted: Provided always, that any perſon eſcaping into the ſame, from whom labor or ſervice is lawfully claimed in any one of the original ſtates, ſuch fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed and conveyed to the perſon claiming his or her labor or ſervice as aforeſaid.

Be it ordained by the authority aforeſaid, That the reſolutions of the 23d of April, 1784, relative to the ſubject of this ordinance, be, and the ſame are hereby repealed and declared null and void.

DONE by the UNITED STATES in CONGRESS aſſembled, the 13th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1787, and of their ſovereignty and independence the 12th.

Chas Thomſon Secy

OF 1787
ic Library, Emmet Collection)

1800, they must have been made subsequent to that date. It has been generally stated by historians that the famous seven ranges extended from the Ohio River to the forty-first parallel, and even some of the veterans of the United States general land office were of the same opinion in April, 1909. 1787

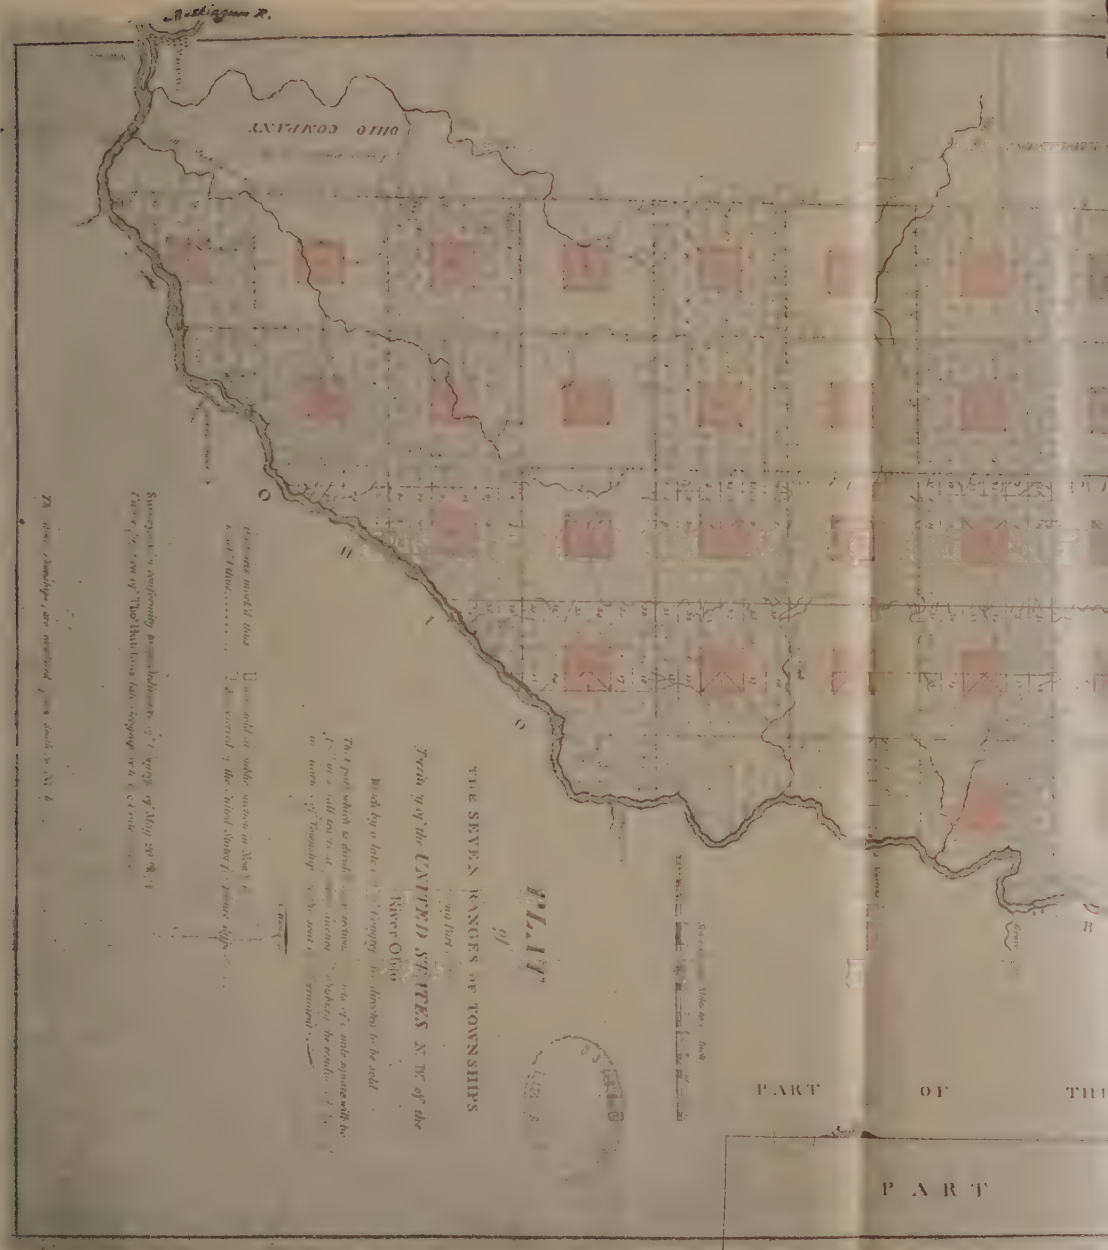

The movement to secure western lands for the officers and soldiers of the Revolution, begun at Newburg in 1783, led, three years later, to the formation of the Ohio Company of Associates, a joint stock venture for the purchase of lands on the Ohio River. The directors were General Samuel H. Parsons of Connecticut, General Rufus Putnam of Massachusetts, and Manasseh Cutler, a Massachusetts doctor of divinity who had "an aptitude for business and was not above turning an honest penny in a land-speculation which bade fair to be remunerative and interesting." In May, 1787, General Parsons presented to congress, then sitting in New York, a memorial in behalf of the company. He was soon succeeded by Doctor Cutler whose ostensible business was to purchase as much land as congress would exchange for one million dollars in certificates of public indebtedness. In fact, the organization meant "the conversion of those old final certificates into future homes, westward of the Ohio," and the formation of a new state. Cutler put up at the "Plow and Harrow" in the Bowery on the fifth of July. He seems to have been as much concerned with an ordinance that congress was to take up on the following day as he was with the Parsons memorial. The Ohio Company of Associates — March 3, 1786

Since the passage of the act of 1784, congress had considered several plans for the government of the western territory. A few days after Doctor Cutler's arrival at New York, a "committee consisting of Mr. Carrington, Mr. Dane, Mr. R. H. Lee, Mr. Kean, and Mr. Smith" reported an ordinance for the government of the territory in question and it was read a first time. It was read a second time on the following day. On the day after that, it was read a third time and passed The Ordinance of 1787 — July 11, 1787

1787 with extraordinary unanimity. Each of the eight states then represented, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, voted for it; Mr. Yates of New York was the only delegate who voted against it. This celebrated statute constituted the Northwest territory into one district for temporary government, but reserved to congress the power to divide it into two districts in case such a division should be deemed desirable. Congress was to appoint a governor for three years, a secretary for four years, and three judges to serve during good behavior. As soon as there should be five thousand male citizens of "full age," they were to be given a territorial legislature consisting of the governor, a council of five appointed by congress, and a house of representatives elected by the people. The legislature might choose a delegate to congress who was to enjoy "a right of debating but not of voting during this temporary government."

A Memorable Compact

Then followed certain "articles of compact between the original States and the people and States in the said territory." These articles were forever to "remain unalterable, unless by common consent." The first article declared that "no person shall ever be molested on account of his mode of worship or religious sentiments, in the said territory." The benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, the right of trial by jury, proportionate representation in the legislature, the privileges of the common law, and the sanctity of private contracts, were guaranteed. "Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged." Ultimately the territory was to be erected into not fewer than three nor more than five states, the boundary lines of which were drawn subject to such changes as congress might make. A population of sixty thousand free inhabitants would entitle a state to be admitted into the Union "on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever."

Plat of the "Seven Ranges of Townships," surveyed by Thomas Hutchins, United States Geographer, in accordance with ordinances passed by Congress May 20, 1785, and later, from copy, unpublished in recent times, discovered by Albion Morris Dyer, A. M., Curator of Western Reserve Historical Society, in Archives of United States Geological Survey.

We use an early impression from the original copper-plate published about 1795, without date or imprint, by Matthew Carey, Philadelphia, size 13½ x 23½ inches. It was prepared to further the sale of public lands. Later Carey published it, with his imprint, in editions of his Atlas. In the Atlas, however, the plate is much worn.

This was the first survey made by this or any government, dividing public land into ranges and townships, and as such it is of gr been widely adopted in many countries.

The initial point of the survey is a poi boundary of Pennsylvania intersects the nort this point in September, 1785, determined its it as 40°38′02″.

The first year's survey was a line four mi running due west from this point. In 1786, to the ninth range. There it joined the l according to the Greenville Treaty. Later interest, as that method has since then n the Ohio River where the western bank of the Ohio. Hutchins located itude in October and officially reported ong, called the "Geographer's Line," line was extended fifty miles westward, w line marking the Indian boundary

0–1801) these Seven Ranges were extended northerly to 41°, giving four additional townships in each range and continuing the survey to the southern boundary of the Connecticut Reserve.

Documents covering the above information are to be found in the Library of Congress and in the Public Land Office where in 1909 they were discovered by Mr. Dyer.

It has been generally stated by historians that the famous Seven Ranges extended from the Ohio to the forty-first parallel, and so late as April, 1909, this was the general opinion even in the land office.

Copy reproduced herewith is in Museum of Western Reserve Historical Society (loan from United States Geological Survey).

Article six stipulated that "There shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said territory, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall be duly convicted." Thus was the Northwest dedicated to freedom forever. 1787

Its Foundation and Character

The ordinance of 1787 was one of the last acts of the congress of the confederation and one of the few for which that body has received great credit. In the opinion of able constitutional lawyers, congress had no power to pass it. It was not submitted to the states for ratification; it was an act of national sovereignty in the most emphatic sense. Like Jefferson's purchase of Louisiana and Lincoln's emancipation of the slaves, it marked an epoch in American history and was condoned by general consent and popular approval. The ordinance of 1784 divided the western country directly into "states;" the ordinance of 1787 provided a temporary government for the said "territory" and authorized its division into states at some later period. The word "colony" seems to have been carefully avoided; since then, the term "territory" has been applied to this intermediate form of government. The ordinance of 1787 was more than a law or statute; it was a constitution for the Northwest and a model for later legislation. By this time, Jefferson had gone as a minister to France, but

> The nursling growth of Monticello's crest
> Is now the glory of the free Northwest.

The Distribution of Honors

The authorship of the ordinance has occasioned much dispute. The fact is that no one person is entitled to all the credit. It embodied the best parts of that of 1784 and of ordinances subsequently introduced. Much has been claimed for Nathan Dane of Massachusetts, a member of the committee, and it is sure that Doctor Cutler exercised a powerful influence, as did others. As regards the clause prohibiting slavery, that, too, is in doubt. Jefferson's draft of the ordinance of 1784 had contained such a clause; in March, 1785, Rufus King of Massachusetts had introduced a resolu-

1787 tion to the same effect; the first draft of the ordinance of 1787 did not contain the immortal prohibition and, on the second reading, Dane, apparently upon a suggestion from the Virginia delegation, brought it forward. The claim of first place for Doctor Cutler is, however, ably and persistently urged by many, and the last word has not yet been written.

Cheap Land

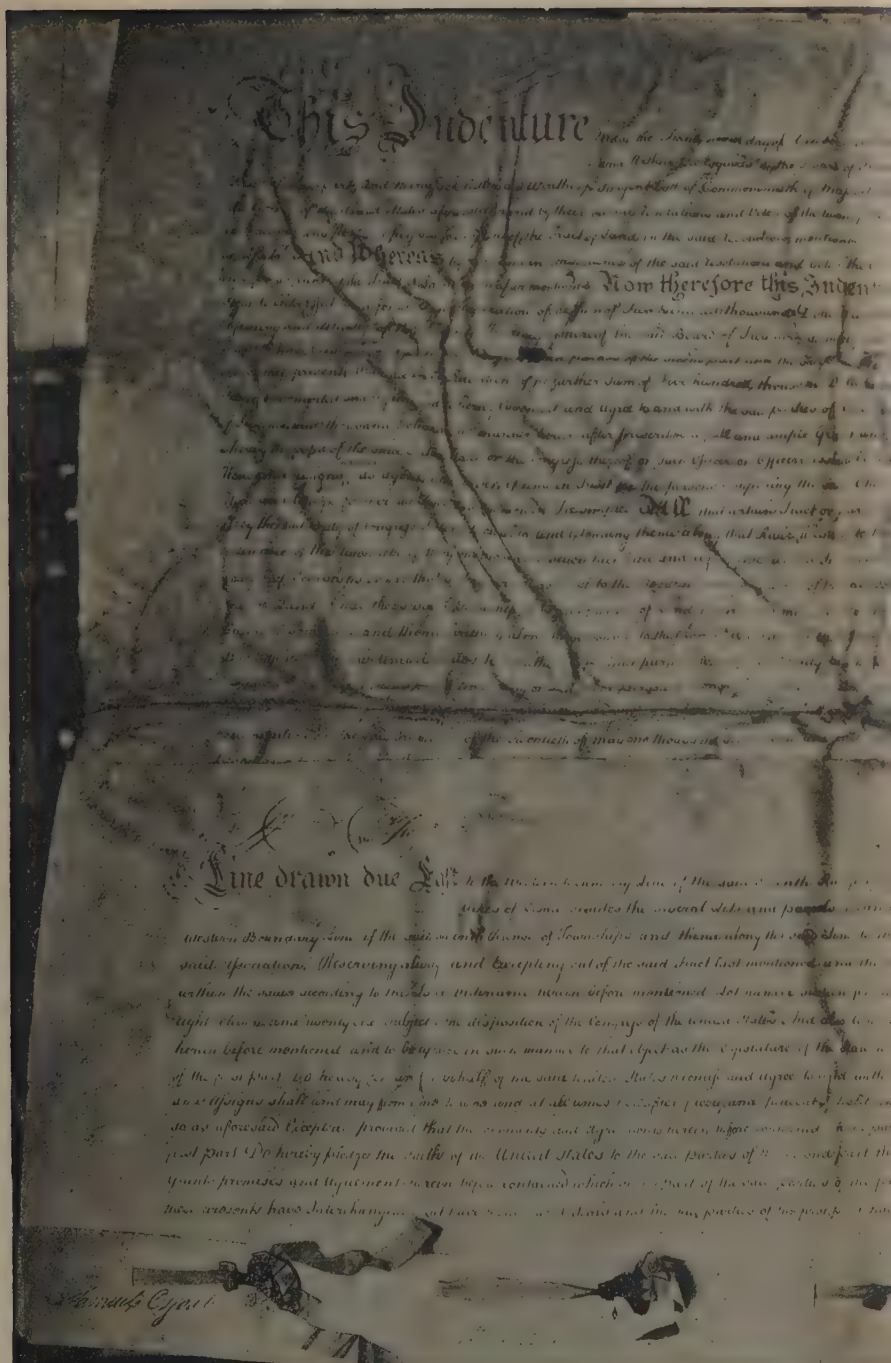

While the ordinance was under consideration, Cutler had been pushing his negotiations for a land purchase; on the twenty-seventh of July, congress authorized the sale of five million acres in the region north of the Ohio and east of the Scioto. A million and a half acres were for the Ohio company; the remainder was "for a private speculation in which many of the principal characters of America are concerned," in other words, the Scioto company. The Ohio company proved to be an effective agent for good, but the Scioto purchase was disastrous to all actively engaged therein. The total price was three and a half million dollars payable in certificates of public indebtedness that were worth about twelve cents on the dollar—the largest private contract that had ever been made in America.

A Master Lobbyist

General Parsons presented his memorial to congress in May and returned without having accomplished anything. In the following month, Putnam and Cutler, the other two directors, met in Boston, and decided that the latter should renew an attempt in which Parsons, and Rufus King, and Jefferson, and Washington, and several committees of congress had conspicuously failed. In his diary, Cutler wrote: "I conversed with General Putnam and settled the principles on which I am to contract with congress for lands on account of the Ohio company." In the two or three days that the ordinance was pending before congress, it was proposed to reject some of the amendments that he had suggested, he does not specify which they were. With worldly wisdom, Cutler promptly "paid his respects to all the members of congress in the city and informed them of his intention to depart that day." He says that they

June 25

OHIO COMPANY'S L

(From original in collection of Mar

CONTRACT

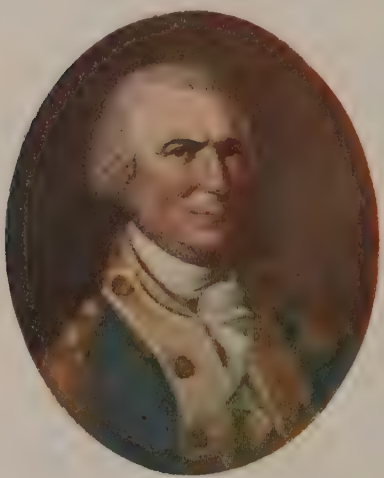

ollege, Marietta, Ohio)

urged him to "tarry till the next day and they would put by all other business to complete the contract." The diary further tells us that "congress came to the terms stated in our letter without the least variation." In other words, according to this account, Putnam and Cutler were masters of the situation and the Ohio company dictated its own terms. 1787

It has been said that the ordinance of 1787 and the Ohio land sale were parts of one transaction. "The purchase would not have been made without the ordinance, and the ordinance could not have been enacted except as an essential condition of the purchase;" one party demanding a satisfactory government as the condition of buying and the other party granting the ordinance in order that it might sell. The purchase and settlement of this large body of the public lands would make a provision for the veterans of the late war; it would wipe out a large part of the public debt; it would greatly increase the value of the rest of the public domain; it would set up a shield between the frontiers of New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia and the dangerous Indian tribes of the Northwest; it would secure American occupation of a territory on which two or three European powers had fixed an eager, longing gaze; and it would put away a real apprehension that the western settlers would form a new confederacy and enter into alliance with the power that held the outlet of the Mississippi—an apprehension that Washington had in mind when he gave warning against "an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power." By this time, constitution builders were in session and the eyes of the people were focussed on the convention at Philadelphia rather than on the congress at New York. How did it Happen?

At this time, the old Northwest, a territory larger than the present German empire, was practically an unbroken wilderness. The French at Vincennes, Kaskaskia, and elsewhere, numbering probably fewer than five thousand, a few settlers at New Design on the Mississippi, a few Moravian missionaries, a few hunters, Marietta 1787 squatters, and soldiers, were its only civilized inhabitants.

1788 But the dawn of a new day was at hand. By the advice of Thomas Hutchins, the Ohio company selected the valley of the Muskingum, in which Fort Harmar had lately been completed, for its settlement. The advance guard of the colonists reached the Youghiogheny River on the twenty-third of January, 1788, and the second division three weeks later. Here they built boats and, after the breaking up of the ice, descended the Ohio to the Muskingum. On the seventh of April, 1788, General Rufus Putnam, a hero of two wars and now superintendent or general director of the affairs of the Ohio company, with forty-seven others, stepped on shore from the deck of a row-galley, then or later, named the "Mayflower." The forty-eight pioneers at once began the work of felling trees, building houses, and erecting a stockade called "Campus Martius." Before the end of the year, eighty-four other persons arrived. Such were the beginnings of Marietta, named for Marie Antoinette. "No colony in America," wrote Washington, "was ever settled under such favorable auspices as that just commenced at the Muskingum. Information, property, and strength will be its characteristics. I know many of the settlers personally, and there were never men better calculated to promote the welfare of such a community."

Arthur Saint Clair

Civil Government Established

October 5, 1787

Meanwhile, congress had appointed General Arthur Saint Clair governor, and Major Winthrop Sargent, of Massachusetts, secretary of the new territory; General Samuel Holden Parsons of Connecticut,

General James M. Varnum of Rhode Island, and Major John Armstrong of Pennsylvania were chosen territorial judges. Major Armstrong declined the proffered judgeship and, in the following February, Judge John Cleves Symmes of New Jersey was appointed in his stead. Saint Clair reached Marietta on the ninth of July, 1788—too late to participate in a grand celebration of the Fourth. On the twenty-sixth, he proclaimed the establishment of Washington County—the first erected in the Northwest territory. In August, provision was made for establishing courts some of which were formally inaugurated in September. Thus the wheels of government were set in motion and civil life was begun in the old Northwest. 1787 1790

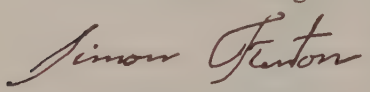

In the year that the Ohio company made its purchase, another company secured what was called the Miami purchase or Symmes tract, a million acres lying north of the Ohio and between the two Miamis. In the following year, three rival towns were laid out therein—Columbia, Losantiville, and North Bend. In about a year, Governor Saint Clair arrived at Losantiville, organized Hamilton County, and changed the name of the town to Cincinnati in honor of the military society of which he was a prominent member. Says Hinsdale: "Those philosophers who trace all historical phenomena to physical causes may read a suggestive lesson in the history of the Miami purchase. The location of North Bend is as favorable as that of Cincinnati. It was the home of Judge Symmes and the first station of the troops detailed by General Harmar to protect the Miami pioneers." But the removal of the family of the jealous husband of a black-eyed matron from North Bend to the rival town promptly convinced the commanding officer of the troops of the superior military advantages of that location. Hence "the walls of Fort Washington and the ascendancy of the town named for the Cincinnati." Cincinnati

December 24, 1788

January 2, 1790

Meanwhile, the whole western country had been troubled by a renewal of Indian hostilities. The Troubles with the Indians

1783 Cherokees had been severely chastised by Sevier in 1790 1780 and 1782. The news that the peace with England had robbed them of their British allies checked the activity of the Delawares, Shawnees, and Wyandots and, in 1785 and 1786, they concluded treaties that were recklessly disregarded by both white men and red men. The continental forces were too weak to afford much protection to the pioneers, and British agents and Tory partisans incited the Indians to new activities. In September, 1786, George Rogers Clark, the wreck of his former self, led a force of twelve hundred men up the Wabash, but, after reaching Vincennes, the troops became mutinous and most of them marched home as a disorderly mob. In October, another force led by Benjamin Logan, a Kentucky pioneer, destroyed some of the Shawnee towns about the head of the Mad River in Ohio—a success that was sullied by the cold-blooded murder of a captive chief by one of Logan's colonels whom Logan did not dare to punish for his infamous deed. Smaller expeditions followed, but the most effective work was doubtless done by Captain Samuel Brady, Simon Kenton, and other celebrated scouts who, alone or with small parties, made forays into the Indian country, the story of which is entertainingly and instructively told by Mr. Roosevelt in his The Winning of the West.

Autograph of Simon Kenton

South of the Ohio

In these years, hundreds of the western settlers were killed by the Indians, but the westward movement was not checked. In the year ending in November, 1788, nearly a thousand boats, bearing about eighteen thousand persons, nearly eight thousand horses, twenty-three hundred cows, and eleven hundred sheep are said to have gone down the Ohio. Other settlers came in over the Wilderness Road and, by 1790, Kentucky had a population of more than seventy thousand. A similar influx was taking place further south. In 1778, a trapper named Spencer raised a crop of corn near Bledsoe's Lick in middle Tennessee. Early the next year, 1780

James Robertson with a party of eight established a 1790 settlement at French Lick on the site of Nashville, and other settlers followed. In May, 1780, these settlers entered into a compact for government. In spite of Indian attacks, other stations were established. On the second of April, 1781, the Cherokees were defeated at the "Battle of the Bluffs" and the existence of middle Tennessee was assured. In 1783, Robertson was elected to the North Carolina legislature; through his activity, the Cumberland settlement was erected into Davidson County, from which, in 1786, Sumner County was set off. The settlers suffered much from the Indian ravages, but, in the summer of 1787, Robertson led a force against a Creek and Cherokee town on the Coldwater, a tributary of the Tennessee, and struck a blow that gave a breathing spell to the new settlements. Among the newcomers of this period was a young lawyer, Andrew Jackson. By 1790, the Southwest territory contained nearly thirty-six thousand inhabitants.

CHAPTER XX

BUILDING THE SHIP

Washington's Opinion

WASHINGTON'S experience with the continental congress had taught him the vital need and value of union; "he felt it as soon as he took command of the army, and it rode like black care behind him from Cambridge to Yorktown." At the close of the war, he forcibly expressed the necessity of a stronger central government. "There are four things which I humbly conceive are essential to the well-being, I may even venture to say to the existence, of the United States, as an independent power." These things were an indissoluble union of the states under one federal head, a regard to public justice, the adoption of a proper peace establishment, and the sinking of local interests and prejudices in a patriotic desire for the welfare of the nation as a whole. In an appeal to the army, he again expressed his opinion that "unless the principles of the federal government were properly supported, and the powers of the Union increased, the honor, dignity, and justice of the nation would be lost." From Mount Vernon, he continued to urge his views in letters to prominent men throughout the country.

Other Opinions

As early as September, 1780, Alexander Hamilton had urged a "solid coercive union." In 1785, Noah Webster wrote an essay in which he asserted that "there must be a supreme power at the head of the union, vested with authority to make laws that respect the states in general and to compel obedience to those laws." James Madison grew more earnest as time went by and Pelatiah Webster continued to point out the need of a stronger government. In 1784, there was much talk among members of congress in favor of a convention, but nothing came of it. Among the excuses offered was fear of the Cincinnati. "Such a measure," said Rufus King, "would produce thro'out the Union, an exertion of the friends of an Aristocracy to Send members who would promote a change of Government."

1781 1785

Noah Webster
(From portrait by Sharpless in Independence Hall, Philadelphia)

Inland Navigation

While Washington was urging a stronger government, he was also interested in the development and settlement of the West. Almost alone among Americans, he had foreseen the growth and greatness of America and the need of a system of inland navigation. Such a system would benefit the older sections and the new, and serve as a strong bond of union. As early as 1770, he had pointed out the commercial and political importance of easy transit lines, east and west. In 1783, as stated in an earlier chapter, he explored the route later taken by the Erie canal and the New York Central railway. Soon after his return to Mount Vernon, he began energetic efforts to open up a line of communication through the valley of the Potomac, a line later followed by the Chesapeake and Ohio canal and by the Baltimore and Ohio railway. Through his influence, the Virginia legislature took up the ques-1785 1786 tion and two companies were formed. An agreement with Maryland regarding the navigation of the Chesapeake and the Potomac was necessary and, in the spring of 1785, commissioners from the two states met at Alexandria. The commissioners came to an agreement regarding the common navigation of the bay and the river and requested Pennsylvania to allow the free use of streams within her limits as connecting links between the Ohio and the Potomac. They also recommended uniform import duties, commercial regulations, and currency.

A Commercial Convention

In giving its assent to the recommendations respecting uniform duties, Maryland proposed that Pennsylvania and Delaware should be invited to send commissioners to meet those of Maryland and Virginia and to unite in the same system of commercial policy. Madison persuaded the Virginia legislature to appoint representatives to meet commissioners from all the states that might choose to be represented "to consider how far a uniform system in their commercial regulations may be necessary to their common interest and their permanent harmony." The commissioners were to meet at Annapolis on the first Monday in September, 1786.

January 21, 1786

Hamilton's Address

When the convention met, only Virginia, Delaware, Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey were represented. Even Maryland had neglected to appoint delegates; New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and North Carolina had chosen representatives, but they did not attend the meeting; Connecticut, South Carolina, and Georgia had taken no action in the matter. Under such circumstances, the delegates "did not think it advisable to proceed on the Business of their Mission," but they did adopt an address to the states written by Hamilton and "toned down" by Edmund Randolph. The address called attention to the fact that there were defects in the system of government that rendered the situation "delicate and critical, calling for an exertion of the united Virtue and Wisdom of all the members of the Confederacy." It, therefore, proposed a convention of all the states to meet at Philadelphia on the second Monday in May, 1787, to "devise such further Provisions as shall appear to them necessary to render the Constitution of the Fœderal Government adequate to the exigencies of the Union." Although the commissioners "could not with propriety address these Observations and Sentiments to any but the States they have the honor to Represent, they have nevertheless concluded, from motives of respect, to transmit Copies of this Report, to the United States in Congress Assembled, and to the Executives of the other States." 1786 1787

September 14, 1786

Congress Anoints its Wounded Pride

In October, the report of the commissioners was brought before congress. Largely through the influence of Rufus King and Nathan Dane, that body refused to sanction the plan, but the Shays rebellion and other happenings of that eventful winter worked a change in the minds of the delegates. Even King threw aside his objections and advocated the measure. On the twenty-first of February, congress issued a call for a convention to meet at the time and place mentioned by the delegates at Annapolis "for the sole and express purpose of revising the articles of confederation, and reporting to Congress and the several Legislatures, such alterations therein, as shall, when agreed to in Congress, and confirmed by the States, render the federal Constitution adequate to the exigencies of Government, and the Preservation of the Union."

State Action

Even before congress took this step, the states had begun to act upon the report of the Annapolis convention. On the sixteenth of October, Virginia authorized the sending of delegates and, on the fourth of December, selected them. On the twenty-fourth of November, New Jersey fell into line and, before February, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, Georgia, and Delaware had decided to send representatives. Maryland did not appoint delegates until the twenty-sixth of May, and New Hampshire not until the twenty-seventh of June. Rhode Island was not represented at all; the stubborn little maid was pronounced "abominable" and it was 1787 proposed to divide her estate between Massachusetts and Connecticut.

The Delegates

Of the fifty-five delegates who attended the convention, twenty-nine were college graduates and nearly all had attained eminence. Washington and Franklin were there, their presence lending dignity and weight to the proceedings. With them were John Dickinson, Robert Morris, Gouverneur Morris, Edmund Randolph, George Mason, John Rutledge, Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, Oliver Ellsworth, James Wilson, Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, and other statesmen of constructive power. But not all the nation's illustrious citizens were delegates: Thomas Jefferson and John Adams held diplomatic posts in Europe, while Richard Henry Lee, Patrick Henry, and Samuel Adams disapproved of the convention and remained at home. Had the author of the declaration of independence been a member of the convention, it is possible that the constitution would have been less strenuous as to the rights of property and more emphatic as to the rights of man.

Charles Cotesworth Pinckney
(From portrait by Sharpless in Independence Hall, Philadelphia)

Hamilton and Madison

Hamilton was only thirty and Madison only thirty-six, but along political lines they were probably the most profound and original thinkers in the company. "Among political writers," says John Fiske, "these two men must be ranked in the same order with Aristotle, Montesquieu, and Locke; and the 'Federalist,' their joint production, is the greatest treatise on government that has ever been written." Hamilton had obtained a seat in the New York legislature with the express purpose of opposing the Clinton party and securing representation of the state in the convention. After a hard struggle, he had obtained his own appointment, but his colleagues, Yates and Lansing, were strong states-right men and withdrew from the convention before its labors were completed. While they remained in the convention, Hamilton was unable to carry the vote of his state for the measures that he favored; after their withdrawal, he prudently refrained from taking a too active part and was himself a long time absent. His inclinations were for an aristocratic government. Madison was less brilliant than was Hamilton, but he was a sound thinker and has been called the "Father of the Constitution." 1787

While Waiting

The date set for the convention was Monday, the fourteenth of May, but more than a week went by before seven states were represented. Among the delegates who were on time was Washington whose sense of duty had overcome his reluctance. He well understood the gravity of the work and, in the interval of waiting, appears to have engaged in informal discussion with the other delegates. It was doubtless on one of these occasions that, according to Gouverneur Morris, he said in substance: "It is probable that no plan we propose will be adopted. Perhaps another dreadful conflict is to be sustained. If, to please the people, we offer what we ourselves disapprove, how can we

The State House, Philadelphia, 1776
(From print in the collection of C. S. Keyser)

1787 afterwards defend our work? Let us raise a standard to which the wise and the honest can repair. The event is in the hand of God."

Organization and Records

The first real session of the convention was held in Independence Hall on Friday, the twenty-fifth of May, with twenty-nine delegates representing nine states; the delegates from the other states except Rhode Island appeared later. These men were to lift their country from the quagmire of a league of states and place it on the firm foundation of national sovereignty; they were to perfect in a season of tranquillity a government that had been rudely formed amid the agonies of a revolution. Fortunately for America and the world, the assembled craft were master workmen, capable of the highest of the moral virtues and magnanimous enough to make mutual concessions for the sake of a union that they knew to be their only hope. Washington was unanimously chosen president and Major William Jackson was elected secretary. It was decided that the sessions should be secret, but Proceedings were kept; at the close of the convention, the official files were, by direction of the convention, retained by Washington. In 1796, he transmitted them to the secretary of state and, in 1818, they were published; they contain little more than the bare record of meetings, resolutions, and votes. Yates, King, and a few others kept fragmentary notes, but it was not until fifty years later, when Madison's painstaking notes were published, that men knew what was said and done during those momentous sessions.

Many Men of Many Minds

The problems that faced the convention were many and tremendous. There were wide differences of opinion as to what the convention should attempt to do. Should it merely amend the articles of confederation, or should it create an entirely new system? If the latter, what should the new system be? Outside the convention, there was some fear that a monarchy would be established. In England, the hope was expressed that a younger son of George III. might be selected, but there was greater fear lest the crown might be offered to a French prince. Among the delegates, there seems to have been no disposition to create a monarchy; the unanimity ended there. Some wished a strong national government, others a weak confederacy; some favored aristocracy, others a democracy; and on the details of any system there were probably no two delegates in accord. 1787

The Virginia Plan

Although the convention was authorized merely to propose amendments to the articles of confederation, the ablest delegates were in favor of going beyond their instructions and creating a new government. With this thought and guided "by Madison's indefatigable temper," the Virginia delegates had drawn up a plan for a new constitution which Randolph introduced in an able speech. This "Virginia plan," which became the basis for the convention's work, provided for a bicameral legislature, the members of the first branch of which were to be chosen by the people of the several states, while those of the second branch were to be chosen by the first. This legislature was to exercise the legislative rights vested in the old confederation and all other legislative rights to which the several states were incompetent. State officials were to "be bound by oath to support the articles of Union;" the national authority was to have the power to call out the militia to compel a member of the Union to "fulfil its duty," and the power to veto all laws contravening the "articles of Union." A national executive and a national judiciary were to be established. Republican government was to be guaranteed, new states were to be admitted, and a system of amendment was to be provided. Before the new constitution should become effective, it was to be submitted to state constituent assemblies or special assemblies for acceptance or rejection. May 29

Randolph's Resolutions

After Pinckney of South Carolina had presented a somewhat similar plan, the Virginia plan was definitely placed before the convention by Randolph in a series of resolutions. The first resolution, to the effect "that a union of the States merely federal will not accomplish the objects proposed by the articles of Confederation," May 30 1787 and a second, "that no treaty or treaties among the whole or parts of the States, as individual Sovereignties, would be sufficient," passed without much discussion. The third resolution, to the effect "that a national Government ought to be established consisting of a supreme Legislative, Executive, and Judiciary," went nearer to the heart of the problem and aroused more opposition, but it was finally passed with only one negative vote, that of Connecticut, the delegation present from New York, Yates and Hamilton, being divided.

A State is a State

The proposition for proportional representation aroused a more strenuous opposition. The question was not new. When the continental congress was considering the articles of confederation, there had been the same difference of opinion; the smaller and landless states like Maryland, Delaware, and New Jersey had insisted upon the same voice in the central government as the great states like Virginia and Massachusetts. The controversy over this subject became the most bitter of all; for the time being, the subject was passed over and the convention considered matters less likely to provoke dangerous differences of opinion.

Afraid to Trust the People

The question of how the members of the national legislature should be chosen brought another controversy. The Shays rebellion, the paper money excesses in Rhode Island, and similar manifestations had produced something of a reaction against a purely popular government. Roger Sherman of Connecticut opposed the plan of electing members by direct vote of the people and insisted that the choice ought to be made by the legislatures; he thought that the people should have as little as possible to do with the government. Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts thought that the country was suffering from an excess of democracy and said that the people were "the dupes of pretended patriots." Mason admitted that perhaps the country had been too democratic, but feared going to the other extreme; he argued strongly for electing members of the first branch of the legislature by direct vote of the people. Wilson, Madison, and others spoke in favor of such a system and, by a vote of six to two, two states being divided, it was adopted. Opinions varied so much, however, regarding the election of members of the second branch that the final consideration of the question, like that regarding proportional representation, was postponed. 1787

Coercive Power

On the thirty-first of May, it was agreed that each branch of the proposed legislature should have the right to initiate legislation and that the new government should have all the powers exercised by the confederation. A proposal to add powers in "cases to which the separate states are incompetent" aroused opposition. Randolph and Madison advocated a definite enumeration of powers, but the resolution was adopted in the more general form. Another resolution giving the central legislature power to negative all state laws contravening the "articles of Union" or any treaties made with foreign powers was adopted without opposition. May 31 A proposition to grant the national legislature power to "call forth the force of the Union against any member of the Union failing to fulfil its duty under the articles thereof" aroused more debate. Madison, though eager for an efficient government, opposed force "when applied to the people collectively and not individually." He believed that "the use of force against a State would look more like a declaration of war than an infliction of punishment." He hoped that a system might be framed that would render such a recourse unnecessary and moved that consideration of the clause be postponed, which was agreed to.

A Difficult Problem

By the fifth of June, a large part of the Virginia plan had been adopted with more or less modification. Some of the most crucial matters, however, had been postponed; when they were taken up again, the trouble was renewed. On the sixth, the question of how the members of the first branch of the legislature should be chosen was again considered. Distrust of popular election again revealed itself, but the former decision was allowed to stand. In the debate, Dickinson advo-

1787 cated having one branch chosen by the people and the other by the legislatures, but the latter proposal aroused the apprehension of the large-state party who feared that it would lead to the loss of proportional representation. On the seventh, the compromise received the votes of all the states. On the ninth, the question of proportional representation came up directly. The small-state party seemed determined not to yield, for to yield meant to give up "not only the sovereignty but the dignity and safety of their states." Virginia, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia desired representation in proportion to their importance partly because they desired the greater political influence that it would give to them and partly because they were afraid that the small states might vote away their money. The members of the small-state party, representing Maryland, Delaware, New Jersey, New York, and Connecticut, were influenced by a variety of motives. In general, they were inclined "rather to patch up the old than to create a new system;" their great dread was that "the larger states would devour the small."

Representation in Congress

A violent controversy quickly developed. Wilson of Pennsylvania hinted that, if the small states refused to accept the plan, the large states would form a union of their own. In reply, Paterson declared that New Jersey would "never confederate on the plan before the Committee. She would be swallowed up. He had rather submit to a monarch, to a despot than to such a fate." Wilson retorted that he did not fear the defection of the small states and he objected to any system in which it would require one hundred and fifty men in Pennsylvania to balance fifty in New Jersey. At first, the large-state men triumphed. On the eleventh of June, they carried a motion declaring for "equitable" instead of "equal" representation. A resolution in favor of proportional representation in the second branch, or senate as it was coming to be called, was carried by a majority of one. But the small-state men were determined not to yield their point and resolved to break up the convention rather than to accept defeat. 1 - 8 -

The New Jersey Plan

On the fifteenth of June, Paterson, on behalf of his party, brought in a "purely federal" plan that he wished to substitute for the Virginia plan. It provided merely for amending the articles of confederation in order "to render the federal Constitution adequate to the exigencies of Government, and the preservation of the Union." Congress was to be given power to levy import and stamp duties and to regulate foreign and domestic commerce. There were to be a plural executive and a supreme federal judiciary. In case any state, or any body of men in any state, should oppose or prevent the carrying into execution of such acts or treaties, the federal executive was to be "authorized to call forth the powers of the Confederated States, or so much thereof as may be necessary to enforce and compel an Obedience to such Acts, or an observance of such Treaties." The sixth resolution was to the effect "that all Acts of the U. States in Cong.[s] made by virtue & in pursuance of the powers hereby & by the articles of confederation vested in them, and all Treaties made and ratified under the authority of the U. States . shall be the supreme law of the respective States so far forth as those Acts or Treaties shall relate to the said States or their Citizens, and that the Judiciary of the several States shall be bound thereby in their decisions, anything in the respective laws of the Individual States to the contrary notwithstanding." Here was a discovery — "the most important single principle that had yet been presented," says Professor McLaughlin.

Federal or National

Lansing of New York declared that the new plan "sustains the sovereignty of the respective States, that of Mr. Randolph destroys it." "Why," asked Wilson, "should a National government be unpopular? Has it less dignity? Will each Citizen enjoy under it less liberty or protection? Will a Citizen of Delaware be degraded by becoming a Citizen of the United States? . . . It is from the National Councils that relief 1787 is expected." Randolph denied that the convention

June 17 ought to be strictly bound by its instructions. He "was not scrupulous on the point of power. When the salvation of the Republic was at stake, it would be treason to our trust, not to propose what we found necessary. . . . The true question is whether we shall adhere to the federal plan, or introduce the national plan. The insufficiency of the former has been fully displayed by the trial already made. . . . A nat.[l] Gov.[t] alone, properly constituted, will answer the purpose." After Madison had "fairly riddled" Paterson's plan, the convention, by a vote of seven to three, the Mary-
June 19 land delegation being divided, adhered to the Virginia plan.

Nationality The Virginia plan, as amended by the convention, was then taken up and debated anew. The old differences of opinion reappeared. On the twentieth of June, the word "national" was stricken out—the basis of a claim that the framers did not intend to establish a national government. To this it has been answered that the action of the convention had "no such significance, for the resolution to omit the word was unani-June 20 mously adopted at a time when the men desiring a national government were in control of the convention; the reason alleged for the omission was not that the purpose of establishing a national government was given up; the men chiefly desiring a national government were evidently not intent on the word, if their object was accomplished; the word was used and the fact dwelt on in debate after the omission of the word from the resolutions."

A Dangerous Rock On the twenty-seventh of June, the question of proportional representation again came up. The small-state men were now ready for a supreme effort. In a vehement speech, Martin of Maryland declared that "the corner-stone of a federal government is equality of votes. . . . I would rather confederate with any single state than submit to the Virginia plan." The contest became so heated that a dissolution of the convention seemed likely. Hamilton and others pointed out that under the proportional system the small states might lose their equality but that their citizens would not lose their liberty. On the question of representation in the first branch of congress, the large-state men were victorious by a vote of six to four, Maryland's delegation being divided. The composition of the second branch was then taken up amid tense excitement. Bedford of Delaware declared that "the Large States dare not dissolve the confederation. If they do, the small ones will find some foreign ally of more honor and good faith, who will take them by the hand and do them justice." Other small-state men argued that under a proportional system the government would become aristocratic. The arguments of the large-state men fell on deaf ears. When the test vote came, the Georgia delegation was divided, Maryland voted against proportional representation, and the result was a tie, five to five. It was practically a defeat of the large-state party.

1787

June 29

July 2

The convention was now at a deadlock. Franklin said that "when a broad table is to be made, and the edges of the planks do not fit, the artist takes a little from both and makes a good joint," and Pinckney proposed a committee consisting of a member from each state to devise and report a compromise. The committee reported in favor of proportional representation in the first branch and of equal representation in the second. A long debate followed, but, on the sixteenth of July, the "Connecticut Compromise," as it is called, was adopted by a vote of five to four, the delegation of Massachusetts being divided. The most serious obstacle to agreement had been put out of the way, but the prospects for final success were not yet bright.

The Connecticut Compromise

July 5

The loss of proportional representation in the senate was not as serious as the large-state men believed and "a few fundamental ideas had been hammered out in debate." One of the most important of these was that the central government and the state governments must be kept separate and distinct from each other, that each

Wilson's Wisdom

1787 must have its separate sphere and separate official machinery. As early as the twenty-fifth of June, Wilson had spoken of the "two-fold relation in which the people would stand" as citizens first of the general government and second as citizens of their individual states. Under such a system, the central government, unlike the old confederation, would deal directly with individuals and the necessity of coercing delinquent states would be almost wholly obviated. In other words, the new constitution was to be not merely a compact between the states as states, but a union of the people of the states.

The Supremacy of the National Authority

The proposition that the central government might negative state laws that conflicted with its authority was given up. In its place, the clause in the New Jersey plan concerning the binding power of federal laws and treaties was adopted. In the completed constitution, this clause runs: "This Constitution and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding"—the central clause of the constitution. "Draw out this particular bolt and the machinery falls to pieces."

The Basis of Representation

Before the work could be completed, other compromises were found necessary. As the antagonisms between the large and the small states disappeared, others arose. A dread of future domination by the West showed itself, and Gerry and King went so far as to introduce a motion to the effect that the number of representatives from new states should never exceed the total number from the original thirteen. The motion was voted down, but a more serious sectional antagonism between the North and the South remained. If representatives in congress were to be apportioned according to population, should all inhabitants or merely all free inhabitants be counted? Some of the southern delegates and especially those from South Carolina were determined that the slaves should be counted; the northern members were equally determined that they should not be counted. Paterson wanted to know if in Virginia a man had votes in proportion to the number of his slaves and, if not, why should the slaves be represented in the general government. Gouverneur Morris declared that he would never agree "to give such encouragement to the slave-trade as would be given by allowing the southern states a representation for their negroes. He would sooner submit himself to a tax for paying for all the Negroes in the U. States than saddle posterity with such a Constitution." 1787 August 8

An Illogical Adjustment

With such deep-seated differences of opinion, compromise or failure was inevitable. A possible solution had been suggested four years before by the congress of the confederation which had proposed that, in determining the requisition to be paid by a state, three-fifths of the slaves and all of the white persons should be counted. Williamson of North Carolina moved the adoption of a compromise along this line and it was finally agreed that "Representatives and direct Taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included in this Union, according to their respective Numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole Number of free Persons, including those bound to Service for a Term of Years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other Persons."

The Slave-trade and Navigation Acts

The feeling that slavery was an evil that, in the course of time, would be extinguished was strong even in the South. But the industries of South Carolina and Georgia depended so largely upon a plentiful supply of slaves that their delegates were determined not to accept any provision that did away with the traffic. Pinckney "admitted it to be reasonable that slaves should be dutied like other imports," but said that he should consider a rejection of the clause as an exclusion of South Carolina from the Union. At the same time, the evils 1787 of allowing the states to regulate commerce had become apparent. But the southern states were afraid to grant unreserved power to congress lest the New Englanders gain control of the carrying trade and exact ruinous charges for carrying the southern products to market. To guard against this danger, they insisted that a two-thirds vote in both houses should be made necessary for the passage of navigation acts. To this proposal the New Englanders, "enlightened by their own interests," objected.

Slave-traders and Slave-buyers

Again there was a compromise, or, as Gouverneur Morris called it, a "bargain." Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Connecticut, some of the citizens of which were not averse to the slave-trade, entered into an agreement with Georgia and South Carolina to the effect that the importation of slaves should not be prohibited prior to 1808 and that congress should have the power to regulate commerce by a mere majority vote, it being agreed that no tax was to be laid on exports. Delegates from the middle states and from Virginia opposed the compromise. Martin of Maryland declared that it would be "inconsistent with the principles of the revolution and dishonorable to the American character to have such a feature in the Constitution." Madison thought that it would be wrong to admit into the constitution "the idea that there could be property in men." Mason of Virginia was especially outspoken. In language such as Theodore Parker might have used, he called the slave-trade an infernal traffic. "Every master of slaves is born a petty tyrant. They bring the judgment of heaven on a Country. As nations cannot be rewarded or punished in the next world they must be in this. By an inevitable chain of causes and effects, providence punishes national sins, by national calamities." But the prophetic words were in vain; the bargain was consummated and, for twenty years, the only check that could be laid upon the importation of slaves was a tax not exceeding ten dollars "for each person," a tax that congress was empowered to levy.

1787 Other Powers and Limitations

The apportionment of other powers between the states and the national government aroused many differences of opinion, but no such determined contests. The power to coin money, to fix a standard of weights and measures, to establish post-offices and post-roads, to grant patents and copyrights, to make war and peace, to carry on diplomatic relations with other nations, to punish piracy, to maintain an army and navy, and to call out the militia for defense against a foreign enemy were conceded to the general government without much opposition. The question as to whether the nation should be allowed to subdue a rebellion in a state called out a more serious difference of opinion. Gouverneur Morris, Pinckney, Langdon, and others wished to confer the power unconditionally; Gerry and others were opposed to "letting loose the myrmidons of the United States on a State without its consent." It was finally agreed that the central government should guarantee to each state a republican form of government and that, on the application of a state legislature or of a state executive if the legislature could not be assembled, it should protect the state against domestic violence.

The Distribution of Powers

Numerous other powers that need not be enumerated here were conferred upon the central government and certain others were expressly denied to it. The principle that was followed in the partition of powers, i.e., that the general government should have certain delegated powers and the states all residual powers, was not definitely enunciated in the constitution. The states themselves, however, were expressly prohibited from exercising certain powers. No state, for example, was to enter into any alliance, treaty, or confederation, to coin money, to emit bills of credit, to pass any bill of attainder or any ex post facto law or any law impairing the obligation of a contract, to grant any title of nobility, or, without the consent of congress, to lay any duties on exports or imports, to keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, to enter into any agreement or compact with another state, or to engage in war unless 1787 actually invaded or in such imminent danger as would not admit of delay.

The Legislative Department

The legislative, executive, and judicial powers were separated as they had been in the state constitutions. Much of the work of organizing the legislative department has already been described. The members of the house of representatives were to be elected by the people each for a term of two years. They were to be apportioned among the several states according to population "which shall be determined by adding to the whole Number of free Persons, including those bound to Service for a Term of Years and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other Persons." This "three-fifths of all other Persons" was used as an euphemism for "slaves" —a word that was carefully excluded from the constitution. The number of representatives was not to exceed one for every thirty thousand inhabitants, but each state was to have at least one representative. An actual enumeration of inhabitants was to be made within three years after the first meeting of congress and one every ten years thereafter. Until the completion of the first enumeration, New Hampshire was to have three representatives, Massachusetts eight, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New York six, New Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North Carolina five, South Carolina five, and Georgia three. In the senate, each state was to be represented by two members chosen by the legislature for a term of six years. Instead of the vote of a state being cast as a unit, as in the former congresses, each senator was to have one vote.

The Judiciary

The organization of the judiciary occasioned comparatively little trouble and was largely shaped by a committee of detail to which the whole subject was sent late in July and after the general features of the new system had been determined. "The most remarkable and original of all the creations of that wonderful convention" was the supreme court. In Great Britain, a parliamentary law must stand until parliament repeals it; in the United States, a law passed by both houses of congress and signed by the president becomes null and void when the supreme court, in an individual case, declares the law unconstitutional. This duty of interpreting the constitution in accordance with the general principles of common law has been declared to be "the most noble as it is the most distinctive feature in the government of the United States." 1787

The organization of the executive department occasioned much more perplexity. Among the many wild ideas that were broached was one for "a triple-headed executive, to represent the eastern, middle, and southern states, somewhat as associated Roman emperors at times administered affairs in the different portions of an undivided empire." The Virginia plan had not stated whether the executive should be plural or singular, for the delegates had been unable to agree. Madison had favored a single executive in order to insure efficiency, but Randolph and Mason feared that tyranny might lurk in such an arrangement. When Wilson and Pinckney suggested that the executive power should be given to one man, silence fell upon the convention; no one spoke for several minutes. Sherman expressed the belief that, as the executive was simply an institution for carrying into effect the will of the legislature, such person or persons ought to be appointed by congress and be responsible to that body. But the convention favored having a separation of powers with a system of checks and balances to prevent any one department of the three from becoming too powerful. The first draft of the constitution made no provision for a vice-president, but the danger of a vacancy in the executive office was soon recognized. That the vice-president might be something more than an heir, he was made the presiding officer of the senate, a provision that gave dignity and importance to the office, kept its incumbent in touch with public affairs, gave the senate a chairman who represented no one state, and protected each state against the danger of having half its representation withdrawn

The Executive Department

1787 from active participation in the business of the chamber. After a single chief executive had been agreed upon, the question of how he was to be chosen caused long discussion, and more than thirty votes were taken thereon.

An Electoral College

There was strong opposition to intrusting the choice of the chief executive to the people. "To refer the choice of a proper character for a chief Magistrate to the people would be as unnatural as to refer a trial of colours to a blind man," said Mason, and there were many who agreed with him. There was also much discussion as to the term of office. Should the president serve for one, five, or fifteen years? "Better call it twenty; that's the average reign of princes," said sarcastic Rufus King. On the twenty-sixth of July, the convention voted that the federal executive power should be vested in a single person, "whose stile shall be 'The President of the United States of America.'" He was to be chosen by congress for a term of seven years and was to be ineligible for a second term. Late in August, however, the method of election was referred to a committee that reported in favor of choosing the president for a term of four years with no limitation regarding reëlection, the choice to be made by a system of electors. Each state was to appoint, in such manner as its legislature might direct, a number of presidential electors equal to the whole number of its representatives and senators in congress. These electors were to meet in their respective states and vote for two persons, of whom at least one was to be an inhabitant of some other state. The person receiving the largest number of electoral votes was to be president, and the one receiving the second largest number was to be vice-president. If no one received a majority of such votes, the senate was to choose a president from the five highest on the list, a power that was subsequently transferred to the house of representatives. To conciliate the small states, it was agreed that this vote in the house should be by states. In case of failure by the electoral college, the choice of the vice-president was to be made by the senate. 1787

September 4

A Defective Machine

It was supposed that the presidential electors would exercise a wise discretion in their work and choose with greater wisdom than could be expected of the people. "It was desirable," says Hamilton in The Federalist, "that the sense of the people should operate in the choice of the person to whom so important a trust was to be confided. . . . It was equally desirable that the immediate election should be made by men capable of analyzing the qualities adapted to the station, and acting under circumstances favourable to the deliberation and to a judicious combination of all the reasons and inducements that were proper to govern their choice. A small number of persons selected by their fellow citizens from the general mass, will be most likely to possess the information and discernment requisite to so complicated an investigation." With the development of political parties, the electors became mere automata. Today, no elector would venture to vote for any other than the candidate nominated by his party. Of all the provisions of the original constitution, the electoral college was probably the most defective; even as amended the system is weak and may again, as in 1876-77, involve the country in grave difficulties.

The Rock Foundation

The electoral system was one of the few things in the constitution that was new. A great English statesman once described the American constitution as "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man," but it was not created out of nothingness. To understand it we must know our colonial history and English history back to magna charta. Its framers used materials that had been tested by use and selected them with rare discrimination. For this work, they were well fitted; for years, they had been "steeped in political theory as their great-grandfathers had been in theology. Time has verified the wisdom of their work. The constitution that they framed, slightly amended, is today the supreme law of the old-1787 est republic in the world. Its text in full may be found in the appendix to the next volume.

Signing as Witnesses

By the time that the constitution had been given its final form by Gouverneur Morris, some of the delegates had been called away by their private affairs and others had gone home in disgust. Of those who remained, some were dissatisfied with the work and determined to oppose its adoption by the people; no one seemed wholly content. Franklin confessed "that there are several parts of this constitution which I do not approve, but I am not sure I shall never approve them. . . . The older I grow, the more apt I am to doubt my own judgment, and to pay more respect to the judgment of others." That the constitution might go before the people supported by apparent unanimity, he proposed as the form of ratification: "Done in Convention by the unanimous consent of the States present the 17th of Sep^r. &c—In Witness whereof we have hereunto subscribed our names." This equivocal expression secured the signature of Blount of North Carolina who "had declared that he would not sign so as to pledge himself in support of the plan," but Mason, Randolph, and Gerry "dreaded despotism more than anarchy" and refused to sign even as witnesses. Of the seventy-three delegates appointed, fifty-five had been in attendance at one time or another, but only thirty-nine affixed their names to the completed work; seven others are known to have approved it.

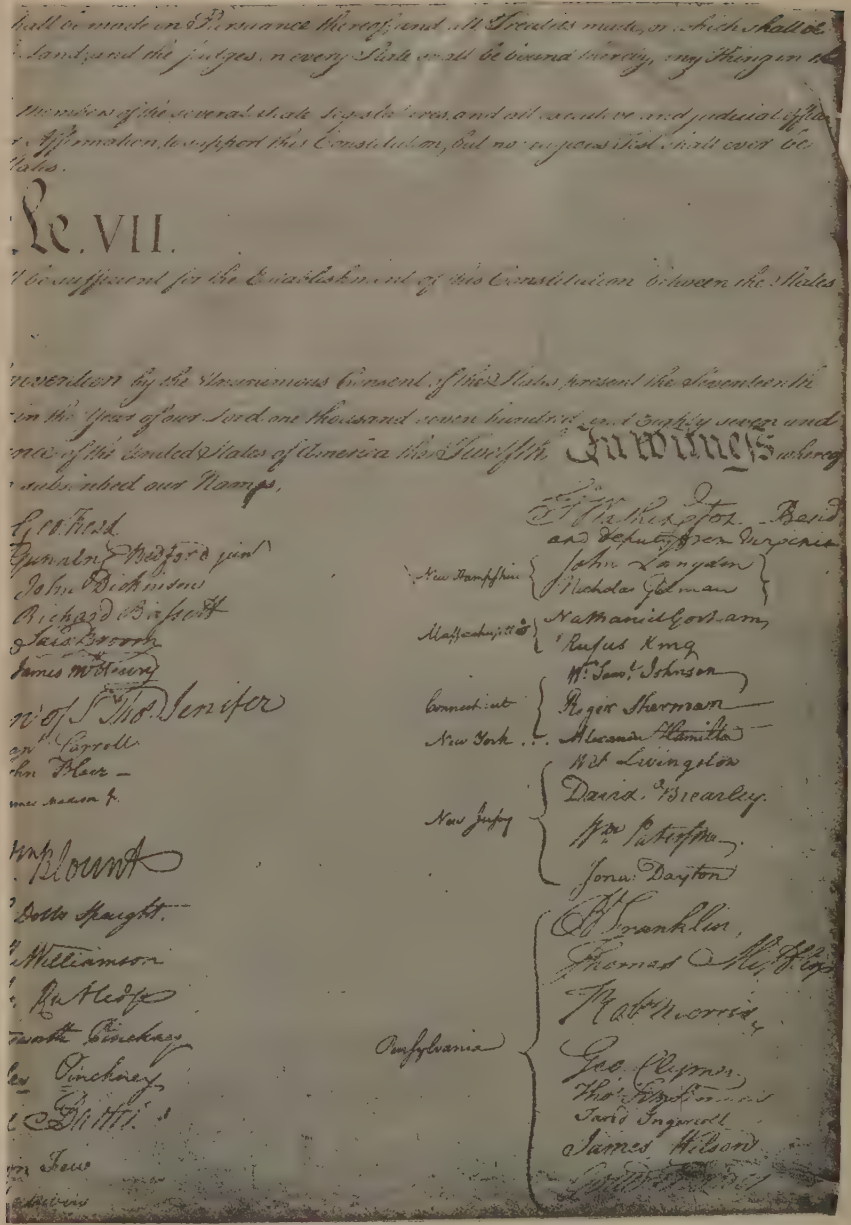

Franklin's Prophecy

Considering the magnitude of the work, the conflicting interests of the delegates, and the frequent clashes during the sessions, the approach to unanimity was remarkable and the general feeling among the delegates was one of hopefulness. While the members were signing the document, Franklin, who had proposed a constitution when "Madison was playing in the nursery and Hamilton was not yet born," indulged in a bit of prophetic pleasantry. Looking at the back of the president's armchair on which was emblazoned a half-sun, brilliant with its gilded rays, he "observed to a

THE CONSTITUTION O

(Last article and signatures. Reproduced from the original in

THE UNITED STATES
the archives of the Department of State, Washington, D. C.)

few members near him that painters had found it difficult to distinguish in their art a rising from a setting sun. I have, said he, often and often in the course of the Session, and the vicissitudes of my hopes and fears as to its issue, looked at that behind the President without being able to tell whether it was rising or setting: But now at length I have the happiness to know that it is a rising and not a setting Sun." Its work all done, the convention finally adjourned on the seventeenth of September. Two days later, the constitution was printed in the Philadelphia newspapers. 1787

Can the Ship be Launched?

Nevertheless, a hard struggle was to ensue before the constitution, evolved through the anxious toil of that summer, could become fundamental law. The convention had decreed that the document should be submitted to the congress of the confederation and to conventions in the various states for their approval, and "the Ratification of the Conventions of nine States" was to be necessary before "the Establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same." Would the people look with favor upon the work of the convention or would they refuse to accept it? "There lay the statue completely wrought. Should it lie there like those huge Egyptian columns that were quarried but never raised? Who should touch it with the vital spark? Where was the personal power, so sovereign, so calm, so pure, so acknowledged that like the blessed might which stilled the raging waters of the sea it should pacify the weltering passions of a continent and, raising the motionless form of the nation, send it alive, indomitable, resistless, upon its radiant, beneficient way?"

APPENDIX

ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION—1777

(See page 160)

To all to whom these Presents shall come, we the undersigned Delegates of the States affixed to our Names, send greeting.

WHEREAS the Delegates of the United States of America in Congress assembled did on the fifteenth day of November in the Year of our Lord One Thousand Seven Hundred and Seventyseven, and in the Second Year of the Independence of America agree to certain articles of Confederation and perpetual Union between the States of Newhampshire, Massachusetts-bay, Rhodeisland and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North-Carolina, South-Carolina and Georgia in the Words following, viz.

"Articles of Confederation and perpetual Union between the States of Newhampshire, Massachusetts-bay, Rhodeisland and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New-York, New-Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North-Carolina, South-Carolina and Georgia.

ARTICLE I. The stile of this confederacy shall be "The United States of America."

ARTICLE II. Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom and independence, and every power, jurisdiction and right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States, in Congress assembled.

ARTICLE III. The said States hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other, for their common defence, the security of their liberties, and their mutual and general welfare, binding themselves to assist each other, against all force offered to, or attacks made upon them, or any of them, on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretence whatever.

ARTICLE IV. The better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different States in this Union, the free inhabitants of each of these States, paupers, vagabonds and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of frēe citizens in the several States; and the people of each State shall have free ingress and regress to and from any other State, and shall enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions and restrictions as the inhabitants thereof respectively, provided that such restrictions shall not extend so far as to prevent the removal of property imported into any State, to any other State of which the owner is an inhabitant; provided also that no imposition, duties or restriction shall be laid by any State, on the property of the United States, or either of them.

If any person guilty of, or charged with treason, felony, or other high misdemeanor in any State, shall flee from justice, and be found in any of the United States, he shall upon demand of the Governor or Executive power, of the State from which he fled, be delivered up and removed to the State having jurisdiction of his offence.

Full faith and credit shall be given in each of these States to the records, acts and judicial proceedings of the courts and magistrates of every other State.

ARTICLE V. For the more convenient management of the general interests of the United States, delegates shall be annually appointed in such manner as the legislature of each State shall direct, to meet in Congress on the first Monday in November, in every year, with a power reserved to each State, to recall its delegates, or any of them, at any time within the year, and to send others in their stead, for the remainder of the year.

No State shall be represented in Congress by less than two, nor by more than seven members; and no person shall be capable of being a delegate for more than three years in any term of six years; nor shall any person, being a delegate, be capable of holding any office under the United States, for which he, or another for his benefit receives any salary, fees or emolument of any kind.

Each State shall maintain its own delegates in a meeting of the States, and while they act as members of the committee of the States.

In determining questions in the United States, in Congress assembled, each State shall have one vote.

Freedom of speech and debate in Congress shall not be impeached or questioned in any court, or place out of Congress, and the members of Congress shall be protected in their persons from arrests and imprisonments, during the time of their going to and from, and attendance on Congress, except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace.

Article VI. No State without the consent of the United States in Congress assembled, shall send any embassy to, or receive any embassy from, or enter into any conferrence, agreement, alliance or treaty with any king, prince or state; nor shall any person holding any office of profit or trust under the United States, or any of them, accept of any present, emolument, office or title of any kind whatever from any king, prince or foreign state; nor shall the United States in Congress assembled, or any of them, grant any title of nobility.

No two or more States shall enter into any treaty, confederation or alliance whatever between them, without the consent of the United States in Congress assembled, specifying accurately the purposes for which the same is to be entered into, and how long it shall continue.

No State shall lay any imposts or duties, which may interfere with any stipulations in treaties, entered into by the United States in Congress assembled, with any king, prince or state, in pursuance of any treaties already proposed by Congress, to the courts of France and Spain.

No vessels of war shall be kept up in time of peace by any State, except such number only, as shall be deemed necessary by the United States in Congress assembled, for the defence of such State, or its trade; nor shall any body of forces be kept up by any State, in time of peace, except such number only, as in the judgment of the United States, in Congress assembled, shall be deemed requisite to garrison the forts necessary for the defence of such State; but every State shall always keep up a well regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutred, and shall provide and constantly have ready for use, in public stores, a due number of field pieces and tents, and a proper quantity of arms, ammunition and camp equipage.

No State shall engage in any war without the consent of the United States in Congress assembled, unless such State be actually invaded by enemies, or shall have received certain advice of a resolution being formed by some nation of Indians to invade such State, and the danger is so imminent as not to admit of a delay, till the United States in Congress assembled can be consulted: nor shall any State grant commissions to any ships or vessels of war, nor letters of marque or reprisal, except it be after a declaration of war by the United States in Congress assembled, and then only against the kingdom or state and the subjects thereof, against which war has been so declared, and under such regulations as shall be established by the United States in Congress assembled, unless such State be infested by pirates, in which case vessels of war may be fitted out for that occasion, and kept so long as the danger shall continue, or until the United States in Congress assembled shall determine otherwise.

Article VII. When land-forces are raised by any State for the common defence, all officers of or under the rank of colonel, shall be appointed by the Legislature of each State respectively by whom such forces shall be raised, or in such manner as such State shall direct, and all vacancies shall be filled up by the State which first made the appointment.

Article VIII. All charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defence or general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States, in proportion to the value of all land within each State, granted to or surveyed for any person, as such land and the buildings and improvements thereon shall be estimated according to such mode as the United States in Congress assembled, shall from time to time direct and appoint.

The taxes for paying that proportion shall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the Legislatures of the several States within the time agreed upon by the United States in Congress assembled.

Article IX. The United States in Congress assembled, shall have the sole and exclusive right and power of determining on peace and war, except in the cases mentioned in the sixth article — of sending and receiving ambassadors — entering into treaties and alliances, provided that no treaty of commerce shall be made whereby the legislative power of the respective States shall be restrained from imposing such imposts and duties on foreigners, as their own people are subjected to, or from prohibiting the exportation or importation of any species of goods or commodities whatsoever — of establishing rules for deciding in all cases, what captures on land or water shall be legal, and in what manner prizes taken by land or naval forces in the service of the United States shall be divided or appropriated — of granting letters of marque and reprisal in times of peace — appointing courts for the trial of piracies and felonies committed on the high seas and establishing courts for receiving and determining finally appeals in all cases of captures, provided that no member of Congress shall be appointed a judge of any of the said courts.

The United States in Congress assembled shall also be the last resort on appeal in all disputes and differences now subsisting or that hereafter may arise between two or more States concerning boundary, jurisdiction or any other cause whatever; which authority shall always be exercised in the manner following. Whenever the legislative or executive authority or lawful agent of any State in controversy with another shall present a petition to Congress, stating the matter in question and praying for a hearing, notice thereof shall be given by order of Congress to the legislative or executive authority of the other State in controversy, and a day assigned for the appearance of the parties by their lawful agents, who shall then be directed to appoint by joint consent, commissioners or judges to constitute a court for hearing and determining the matter in question: but if they cannot agree, Congress shall name three persons out of each of the United States, and from the list of such persons each party shall alternately strike out one, the petitioners beginning, until the number shall be reduced to thirteen; and from that number not less than seven, nor more than nine names as Congress shall direct, shall in the presence of Congress be drawn out by lot, and the persons whose names shall be so drawn or any five of them, shall be commissioners or judges, to hear and finally determine the controversy, so always as a major part of the judges who shall hear the cause shall agree in the determination: and if either party shall neglect to attend at the day appointed, without showing reasons, which Congress shall judge sufficient, or being present shall refuse to strike, the Congress shall proceed to nominate three persons out of each State, and the Secretary of Congress shall strike in behalf of such party absent or refusing; and the judgment and sentence of the court to be appointed, in the manner before prescribed, shall be final and conclusive; and if any of the parties shall refuse to submit to the authority of such court, or to appear or defend their claim or cause, the court shall nevertheless proceed to pronounce sentence, or judgment, which shall in like manner be final and decisive, the judgment or sentence and other proceedings being in either case transmitted to Congress, and lodged among the acts of Congress for the security of the parties concerned: provided that every commissioner, before he sits in judgment, shall take an oath to be administered by one of the judges of the supreme or superior court of the State where the cause shall be tried, "well and truly to hear and determine the matter in question, according to the best of his judgment, without favour, affection or hope of reward:" provided also that no State shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the United States.

All controversies concerning the private right of soil claimed under different grants of two or more States, whose jurisdiction as they may respect such lands, and the States which passed such grants are adjusted, the said grants or either of them being at the same time claimed to have originated antecedent to such settlement of jurisdiction, shall on the petition of either party to the Congress of the United States, be finally determined as near as may be in the same manner as is before prescribed for deciding disputes respecting territorial jurisdiction between different States.

The United States in Congress assembled shall also have the sole and exclusive right and power of regulating the alloy and value of coin struck by their own authority, or by that of the respective States — fixing the standard of weights and measures throughout the United States — regulating the trade and managing all affairs with the Indians, not members of any of the States, provided that the legislative right of any State within its own limits be not infringed or violated — establishing and regulating post-offices from one State to another, throughout all the United States, and exacting such postage on the papers passing thro' the same as may be requisite to defray the expenses of the said office — appointing all officers of the land forces, in the service of the United States, excepting regimental officers — appointing all the officers of the naval forces, and commissioning all officers whatever in the service of the United States — making rules for the government and regulation of the said land and naval forces, and directing their operations.

The United States in Congress assembled shall have authority to appoint a committee, to sit in the recess of Congress, to be denominated "a Committee of the States," and to consist of one delegate from each State; and to appoint such other committees and civil officers as may be necessary for managing the general affairs of the United States under their direction — to appoint one of their number to preside, provided that no person be allowed to serve in the office of president more than one year in any term of three years; to ascertain the necessary sums of money to be raised for the service of the United States, and to appropriate and apply the same for defraying the public expenses — to borrow money, or emit bills on the credit of the United States, transmitting every half year to the respective States an account of the sums of money so borrowed or emitted, — to build and equip a navy — to agree upon the number of land forces, and to make requisitions from each State for its quota, in proportion to the number of white inhabitants in such State; which requisition shall be binding, and thereupon the Legislature of each State shall appoint the regimental officers, raise the men and cloath, arm and equip them in a soldier like manner, at the expense of the United States; and the officers and men so cloathed, armed and equipped shall march to the place appointed, and within the time agreed on by the United States in Congress assembled: but if the United States in Congress assembled shall, on consideration of circumstances judge proper that any State should not raise men, or should raise a smaller number than its quota, and that any other State should raise a greater number of men than the quota thereof, such extra number shall be raised, officered, cloathed, armed and equipped in the same manner as the quota of such State, unless the legislature of such State shall judge that such extra number cannot be safely spared out of the same, in which case they shall raise, officer, cloath, arm and equip as many of such extra number as they judge can be safely spared. And the officers and men so cloathed, armed and equipped, shall march to the place appointed, and within the time agreed on by the United States in Congress assembled.

The United States in Congress assembled shall never engage in a war, nor grant letters of marque and reprisal in time of peace, nor enter into any treaties or alliances, nor coin money, nor regulate the value thereof, nor ascertain the sums and expenses necessary for the defence and welfare of the United States, or any of them, nor emit bills, nor borrow money on the credit of the United States, nor appropriate money, nor agree upon the number of vessels of war, to be built or purchased, or the number of land or sea forces to be raised, nor appoint a commander in chief of the army or navy, unless nine States assent to the same: nor shall a question on any other point, except for adjourning from day to day be determined, unless by the votes of a majority of the United States in Congress assembled.

The Congress of the United States shall have power to adjourn to any time within the year, and to any place within the United States, so that no period of adjournment be for a longer duration than the space of six months, and shall publish the journal of their proceedings monthly, except such parts thereof relating to treaties, alliances or military operations, as in their judgment require secresy; and the yeas and nays of the delegates of each State on any question shall be entered on the journal, when it is desired by any delegate; and the delegates of a State, or any of them, at his or their request shall be furnished with a transcript of the said journal, except such parts as are above excepted, to lay before the Legislatures of the several States.

Article X. The committee of the States, or any nine of them, shall be authorized to execute, in the recess of Congress, such of the powers of Congress as the United States in Congress assembled, by the consent of nine States, shall from time to time think expedient to vest them with; provided that no power be delegated to the said committee, for the exercise of which, by the articles of confederation, the voice of nine States in the Congress of the United States assembled is requisite.

Article XI. Canada acceding to this confederation, and joining in the measures of the United States, shall be admitted into, and entitled to all the advantages of this Union: but no other colony shall be admitted into the same, unless such admission be agreed to by nine States.

Article XII. All bills of credit emitted, monies borrowed and debts contracted by, or under the authority of Congress, before the assembling of the United States, in pursuance of the present confederation, shall be deemed and considered as a charge against the United States, for payment and satisfaction whereof the said United States, and the public faith are hereby solemnly pledged.

Article XIII. Every State shall abide by the determinations of the United States in Congress assembled, on all questions which by this confederation are submitted to them. And the articles of this confederation shall be inviolably observed by every State, and the Union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them; unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States, and be afterwards confirmed by the Legislatures of every State.

And whereas it has pleased the Great Governor of the world to incline the hearts of the Legislatures we respectively represent in Congress, to approve of, and to authorize us to ratify the said articles of confederation and perpetual union. Know ye that we the undersigned delegates, by virtue of the power and authority to us given for that purpose, do by these presents, in the name and in behalf of our respective constituents, fully and entirely ratify and confirm each and every of the said articles of confederation and perpetual union, and all and singular the matters and things therein contained: and we do further solemnly plight and engage the faith of our respective constituents, that they shall abide by the determinations of the United States in Congress assembled, on all questions, which by the said confederation are submitted to them. And that the articles thereof shall be inviolably observed by the States we re[s]pectively represent, and that the Union shall be perpetual.

In witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands in Congress. Done at Philadelphia in the State of Pennsylvania the ninth day of July in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight, and in the third year of the independence of America.

On the part & behalf of the State of New Hampshire.

Josiah Bartlett, John Wentworth, Junr.,
August 8th, 1778.

On the part and behalf of the State of Massachusetts Bay.

John Hancock, Francis Dana,
Samuel Adams, James Lovell,
Elbridge Gerry, Samuel Holten.

On the part and behalf of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations.

William Ellery, John Collins.
Henry Marchant,

On the part and behalf of the State of Connecticut.

Roger Sherman, Titus Hosmer, Samuel Huntington, Andrew Adams.
Oliver Wolcott,

On the part and behalf of the State of New York.

Jas. Duane, Wm. Duer,
Fra. Lewis, Gouv. Morris.

On the part and in behalf of the State of New Jersey, Novr. 26, 1778.

JNO. WITHERSPOON, NATH. SCUDDER.

On the part and behalf of the State of Pennsylvania.

ROBT. MORRIS, WILLIAM CLINGAN,
DANIEL ROBERDEAU, JOSEPH REED,
JONA. BAYARD SMITH, 22d July, 1778.

On the part & behalf of the State of Delaware.

THO. M'KEAN, NICHOLAS VAN DYKE.
Feby. 12, 1779.
JOHN DICKINSON, May 5th, 1779.

On the part and behalf of the State of Maryland.

JOHN HANSON, DANIEL CARROLL,
March 1, 1781. Mar. 1, 1781.

On the part and behalf of the State of Virginia.

RICHARD HENRY LEE, JNO. HARVIE,
JOHN BANISTER, FRANCIS LIGHTFOOT LEE.
THOMAS ADAMS,

On the part and behalf of the State of No. Carolina.

JOHN PENN, July 21, 1778. JNO. WILLIAMS.
CORNS. HARNETT,

On the part & behalf of the State of South Carolina.

HENRY LAURENS, RICHD. HUTSON,
WILLIAM HENRY DRAYTON, THOS. HEYWARD, Junr.
JNO. MATHEWS,

On the part & behalf of the State of Georgia.

JNO. WALTON, EDWD. LANGWORTHY.
24th July, 1778.
EDWD. TELFAIR,

BIBLIOGRAPHICAL APPENDIX

THE following lists are intended to be helpful to the student of this volume by way of suggestion for supplementary reading; they are not offered as complete lists of works consulted by the author. Helpful suggestions are contained in the paragraph introductory to the bibliographical appendix to the first volume of this work. Valuable side-lights on many of the topics herein considered may be found in other general histories of the United States, such as Bancroft's, Hildreth's, etc., some of which are cited in the appendix to the first volume. As the reader can easily find what he wants by reference to the indexes of those works, the following lists omit such references. The general arrangement of this bibliography is similar to that used in the preceding volumes.

CHAPTER I—THE NEW YORK CAMPAIGN

1 Abbatt, William. The Battle of Pell's Point. New York, 1901.

2 Adams, Charles F. Battle of Long Island, in American Historical Review, vol. 1(1896), pp. 650–670. One of the best criticisms of the battle. Also see Orders of Mercer, Sullivan, and Stirling, in American Historical Review, vol. 3(1898), p. 302.

3 Arnold, Isaac N. Life of Benedict Arnold. Chicago, 1879–88.

4 Botta, Charles. History of the War of Independence of the United States of America, translated from the Italian by George A. Otis. Tenth edition, Buffalo and New York, 1854, 2 vols.

5 Carrington, Henry B. Battles of the American Revolution (New York, 1904), pp. 199–254.

6 Chadwick, J. W. The Battle of Long Island, in Harper's Magazine, vol. 53(1876), pp. 333–346.

7 Cullum, George W. The Struggle for the Hudson, in Winsor's Narrative and Critical History of America (Boston, 1886–89, 8 vols.), vol. 6, pp. 275–291, 323–348.

8 Dawson, Henry B. Westchester County, New York, during the American Revolution. Morrisania, 1886. Also published in J. Thomas Scharf's History of Westchester County (Philadelphia, 1886, 2 vols.), vol. 1, pp. 177–457.

9 Eelking, Max von. German Allied Troops in the North American War of Independence, 1776–1783. Translated and abridged by J. G. Rosengarten. Albany, 1893.

10 Emmet, Thomas A. The Battle of Harlem Heights, in The Magazine of History, September, 1906, and January, 1907, and separately printed.

11 Field, Thomas W. Battle of Long Island. Forms vol. 2 of the Memoirs of the Long Island Historical Society, Brooklyn, 1869. Nearly half of the volume consists of an appendix of documents.

12 Fisher, Sydney G. The Struggle for American Independence (Philadelphia, 1908, 2 vols.), vol. 1, pp. 490–521.

13 Fisher, Sydney G. The True History of the American Revolution (Philadelphia, 1902), chap. 19.

14 Fiske, John. The American Revolution (New York, 1891, 2 vols.), vol. 1, pp. 198–252.

15 Force, Peter, editor. American Archives (Washington, 1837–53, 9 vols.), series 5, vols. 1 and 2.

16 Ford, Paul L. Lord Howe's Commission to Pacify the Colonies, in Atlantic Monthly, vol. 77(1896), p. 758.

17 Greene, George W. The German Element in the American War for Independence. New York, 1876.

18 Greene, George W. Life of Nathanael Greene. Boston, 1867–71, 3 vols.

19 Heath, William. Memoirs. Boston, 1798. Published by order of congress. The Heath Papers are printed in Collections of Massachusetts Historical Society, series 7, vol. 5.

20 Heitman, Francis B. Historical Register of Officers of the Continental Army During the War of the Revolution, 1775–1783. Washington, 1893.

21 Hunt, William. The History of England from the Accession of George III. to the Close of Pitt's First Administration, 1760–1801. London, 1907.

22 Irving, Washington. Life of George Washington (New York, 1856–59, 5 vols.), vol. 2, chaps. 30–40.

23 Johnston, Henry P. Battle of Harlem Heights, September 16, 1776. New York, 1897.

24 Johnston, Henry P. The Campaign of 1776 around New York and Brooklyn. Forms vol. 3 of Memoirs of the Long Island Historical Society. Brooklyn, 1878. Contains many documents and maps and is the best extended account of the campaign.

25 Johnston, Henry P. Nathan Hale. New York, 1901. The most critical account of Hale's career.

26 Jones, Thomas. History of New York during the Revolutionary War, and of the Leading Events in the Other Colonies at That Period. Written by a loyalist and edited by E. F. DeLancey. New York Historical Society, 1879, 2 vols.

27 Journals of the Continental Congress. New edition, edited by Worthington C. Ford. Washington, 13 vols. published. There is an old edition, Philadelphia, 1777–88, 13 vols., additional to the "Secret Journals" in 4 vols.

28 Journal of Rev. Ammi R. Robbins in the Northern Campaign of 1776. New Haven, 1850.

29 Kapp, Friedrich. Der Soldatenhandel deutscher Fürsten nach Amerika. Berlin, 1864, 1874.

30 Lecky, William E. H. The American Revolution, Being the Chapters and Passages Relating to America from the Author's History of England in the Eighteenth Century. Arranged and edited by James A. Woodburn (New York, 1898), pp. 240–262.

31 Lodge, Henry C. Story of the Revolution. New York, 1898, 2 vols.

32 Lodge, Henry C. George Washington (Boston, 1889, 2 vols.), vol. 1, pp. 154–170.

33 Lossing, Benson J. The Two Spies Nathan Hale and John André. New York, 1886.

34 Lowell, Edward J. The Hessians and the Other German Auxiliaries of Great Britain in the Revolutionary War. New York, 1884.

35 Lowell, Edward J. The United States of America, 1775–1782. Their Political Struggles and Relations with Europe, in Winsor's America (7), pp. 16–24, 73–78.

36 Mahan, Captain A. T. The Naval Campaign of 1776 on Lake Champlain, in Scribner's Magazine, vol. 23 (1898), pp. 353–370. The best account of the naval operations on Lake Champlain by perhaps the greatest living writer on naval warfare. Also see The Royal Navy History, by William L. Clowes and others (American edition, Boston, 1897–1903, 7 vols.), vol. 3, pp. 353–370.

37 Marks, Mary A. M. England and America, 1763–1783: the History of a [Tory] Reaction (London and New York, 1907, 2 vols.), vol. 1, p. 417 et seq.

38 Marshall, John. The Life of George Washington. Philadelphia, 1804–07, 5 vols.

39 Mather, Frederic G. The Refugees of 1776 from Long Island to Connecticut. New York, 1909.

40 Palmer, Peter S. History of Lake Champlain (Albany, 1866), chap. 7.

41 Partridge, William O. Nathan Hale. New York, 1902. Sympathetic but uncritical.

42 Paullin, Charles O. The Navy of the American Revolution (Cleveland, 1906), pp. 71–80.

43 Seume, Johann G. Mein Leben. In Sämmtliche Werke. Leipzig, 1835. The author was kidnapped and sent to America. He gives an interesting account of the Hessians.

44 Sloane, William M. Von Moltke's View of Washington's Strategy, in Century Magazine, vol. 73(1907), pp. 517–524.

45 Smith, Justin H. Our Struggle for the Fourteenth Colony (New York, 1907, 2 vols.), vol. 2, pp. 459–467.

46 Sparks, Jared, editor. Correspondence of the American Revolution. Boston, 1853, 4 vols. Consists chiefly of letters written to Washington and selected by the editor.

47 Sparks, Jared. Life and Treason of Benedict Arnold. New York, 1835.

48 Stevens, John A. The Battle of Harlem Plains, in Magazine of American History, vol. 4(1880), pp. 351–375.

49 Stevens, John A. The New Version of the Battle of Harlem Plains, in Magazine of American History, vol. 6(1881), p. 260.

50 Stiles, Henry R. History of the City of Brooklyn. Albany, 1867–70, 3 vols.

51 Stirling, William A. Life of William Alexander, Earl of Stirling, in Collections of the New Jersey Historical Society, vol. 2, New York, 1847.

52 Trevelyan, George O. The American Revolution. New York, 1899–1907, 4 vols. published.

53 Trumbull, Jonathan, editor. The Lebanon War Office. Hartford, 1891.

54 Van Tyne, Claude H. The American Revolution (New York, 1905), pp. 102–122.

55 Van Tyne, Claude H. The Loyalists in the American Revolution (New York, 1902), especially chap. 5.

56 Vinton, Francis. General Nathanael Greene. New York, 1893.

57 Washington, George. Writings, edited by Worthington C. Ford. New York, 1889–93, 14 vols.

58 Weaver, Emily P. Nova Scotia During the Revolution, in American Historical Review, vol. 10(1904), pp. 52–71.

59 Wister, Owen. The Freezing of Washington, in Everybody's Magazine, vol. 18(1908), pp. 311–320.

CHAPTER II—TRENTON AND PRINCETON

NOTE.—Additional information about the subject matter of this chapter may be found in older general histories, like Bancroft's, Hildreth's, etc., and in works previously cited in this bibliography and indicated by the marginal numbers (titles) 5, 9, 12, 14, 15, 17, 19, 21, 22, 24, 27, 30, 31, 34, 37, 44, 52, 54, 57. Consult the indexes of such works.

60 Conway, Moncure D. LIFE OF THOMAS PAINE. New York, 1892, 2 vols.

61 Drake, Samuel A. CAMPAIGN OF TRENTON, 1776–77. Boston, 1895.

62 Ford, Paul L. THE TRUE GEORGE WASHINGTON. Philadelphia, 1896.

63 Hale, Edward E. LIFE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON. New York, 1888.

64 Hallam, Orrin B. THE ORIGINAL TREASURY ACCOUNTING OFFICE, in Magazine of American History, vol. 25(1891), pp. 71–76.

65 Lee, Charles. PAPERS, in Collections of the New York Historical Society, series 3, for years 1871–1874. New York, 1872–73. Contains letters and also political and military writings of Lee. The fourth volume contains three memoirs of Lee, including that by Sparks and a reprint of Moore's Treason of Charles Lee.

66 Marshall, Christopher. EXTRACTS FROM DIARY, 1774–81. Edited by William Duane. Albany, 1877.

67 Paine, Thomas. WRITINGS, edited by Moncure D. Conway. New York, 1894–96, 4 vols.

68 Reed, William B. LIFE AND CORRESPONDENCE OF JOSEPH REED. Philadelphia, 1847, 2 vols.

69 Sparks, Jared. LIFE OF CHARLES LEE. Boston, 1846.

70 Stone, Frederick D. THE STRUGGLE FOR THE DELAWARE, in Winsor's America (7), vol. 6, chap. 5.

71 Stryker, William S. THE BATTLES OF TRENTON AND PRINCETON. Boston, 1898. A storehouse of information.

72 Wilson, Woodrow. GEORGE WASHINGTON. New York, 1897.

CHAPTER III—BRANDYWINE AND GERMANTOWN

NOTE.—See the note above, and titles 3, 5, 9, 12, 14, 21, 30, 32, 34, 37, 38, 46, 52, 54, 57, 65.

73 Amory, Thomas C. MILITARY SERVICES AND PUBLIC LIFE OF MAJOR-GENERAL JOHN SULLIVAN. Boston, 1868. Defends Sullivan against the charge that he was responsible for the defeat at Brandywine. Also see his THE MEMORY OF GENERAL JOHN SULLIVAN VINDICATED, in Proceedings of Massachusetts Historical Society, series 1, vol. 9.

74 Balch, Thomas. THE FRENCH IN AMERICA DURING THE WAR OF INDEPENDENCE, 1777–1783. Translated from the French. Philadelphia, 1891–95, 2 vols.

75 BATTLE OF GERMANTOWN DESCRIBED BY A HESSIAN OFFICER. Extracts from the journal and report of Captain Frederick von Munchausen, translated by Joseph G. Rosengarten, in The Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, vol. 16(1892), pp. 197–201, and in The National Magazine, vol. 17(1893), p. 456.

76 Brooks, Noah. HENRY KNOX. New York, 1900.

77 Buck, William J. WASHINGTON'S ENCAMPMENT ON THE NESHAMINY, in The Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, vol. 1(1877), pp. 275–284.

78 Doniol, Henri. HISTOIRE DE LA PARTICIPATION DE LA FRANCE À L'ÉTABLISSEMENT DES ÉTATS-UNIS D'AMÉRIQUE. Paris, 1886–1900, 5 vols. and a supplement. A monumental work, containing the fullest account of the participation of France in the Revolution.

79 Drake, Francis S. LIFE AND CORRESPONDENCE OF HENRY KNOX. Boston, 1873.

80 Ford, Worthington C. THE DEFENCES OF PHILADELPHIA IN 1777, in Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, vol. 18 (1895), pp. 1–19, 163–184, 329–353, 463–495; vol. 19 (1896), pp. 72–86, 234–250, 359–373, 481–506; vol. 20 (1897), pp. 87–115, 213–247, 391–404, 520–551; vol. 21 (1898), pp. 51–71.

81 Graydon, Alexander. MEMOIRS OF A LIFE CHIEFLY PASSED IN PENNSYLVANIA, WITHIN THE LAST SIXTY YEARS. Harrisburg, 1811. New edition, edited by John S. Stockwell and published under the title of Memoirs of His Own Time at Philadelphia, 1846. Contains an account of the Revolutionary period in Philadelphia and of prison life in New York.

82 Harrison, Peleg D. THE STARS AND STRIPES AND OTHER AMERICAN FLAGS. Boston, 1906.

83 Howe, Sir William. ORDER BOOKS, in Collections of New York Historical Society for 1883. New York, 1884.

84 JOURNAL OF CAPTAIN JOHN MONTRESOR, JULY 1, 1777, TO JULY 1, 1778. Edited by Gideon D. Scull, in Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, vol. 5(1881), pp. 393–417, and vol. 6(1882), pp. 34–57, 189–206, 284–299.

85 Kapp, Friedrich. LIFE OF JOHN KALB, MAJOR-GENERAL IN THE REVOLUTIONARY ARMY. New York, 1884.

86 KEMBLE PAPERS, in Collections of the New York Historical Society for 1883–84 (New York, 1884–85), vol. 1, pp. 111–147, 442–

547. These consist of the journals of Colonel Stephen Kemble from 1773–79, while he was deputy adjutant-general of the British army in America; also for the years 1784–85 and 1788, as well as papers relating to the Nicaragua expedition of 1780–81, the order-books of General Howe from Nov., 1775, to May, 1778, some of the orders of Sir Henry Clinton, etc.

87 Lafayette, Marie Jean Paul Roch Yves Gilbert de Motier, marquis de. Memoirs, Correspondence, et Manuscrits, published by his family (Paris, 1837–38, 6 vols., and London, 1837, 3 vols.), vol. 1.

88 Minutes of the Supreme Executive Council of Pennsylvania, commonly known as the Colonial Records (Harrisburg, 1852–53, 16 vols.), vol. 11.

89 Morgan, Forrest, editor. Connecticut as a Colony and as a State (Hartford, 1904, 4 vols.), vol. 2, chap. 5.

90 Muhlenberg, Henry A. Life of Major-General Peter Muhlenberg of the Revolutionary Army. Philadelphia, 1849.

91 Pennsylvania Archives, edited by Samuel Hazard (Philadelphia, 1852–56, series 1, 12 vols.), vols. 5–6.

92 Pickering, Octavius, and Upham, Charles W. Life of Timothy Pickering. Boston, 1867–73, 4 vols.

93 Prisoners of War. No satisfactory treatment of this subject has yet been published. The material that is available is mostly fragmentary or untrustworthy. See Washington's Writings (57), index vol. 14, p. 524; Report on Exchange of Prisoners During the American Revolution, by a committee composed of George T. Curtis, Jared Sparks, and others, in Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society for 1860–62 (Boston, 1862), pp. 325, 347; Irving's Washington (22), especially vol. 3, chap. 2; William Dunlap's History of New York (New York, 1839–40, 2 vols.), vol. 2, chap. 10; Ethan Allen's Narrative of his Captivity, Bennington, 1779, and many later editions; J. M. French's The Simsbury Copper Mines, in The New England Magazine, vol. 5 (1891–92), pp. 427–437; Alexander Johnston's Connecticut (Boston, 1887), pp. 300–301; Van Tyne's Loyalists (55); Mary E. Beam's The Prison Ship Martyrs Monument, in The American Monthly Magazine, vol. 28(1906), pp. 298–302; A Christmas Reminder, being the Names of about Eight Thousand Persons, a Small Portion of the Number Confined on Board the British Prison Ships during the War of the Revolution, published by the Society of Old Brooklynites, Brooklyn, 1888; Charles I. Bushnell's The Adventures of Christopher Hawkins, New York, 1864; Charles I. Bushnell's The Narrative of John Blatchford, New York, 1865; Charles I. Bushnell's The Narrative of Abraham

Leggett, of the Army of the Revolution, New York, 1865; Ryerson's Loyalists of America (374); Jones's New York (26); Graydon's Memoirs (81); The Journals of the Continental Congress (27) contains various inquiries and reports about the treatment of prisoners in British hands; Franklin's Works (149); Andrew Sherburne's Memoirs, 2d ed., Providence, 1831; George Taylor's Martyrs of the Revolution in the British Prison Ships in the Wallabout Bay, New York, 1855; Thomas Dring's Recollections of the Jersey Prison Ship, edited by Albert G. Greene, Providence, 1829, 1865, and reëdited by H. B. Dawson, Morrisania, 1865; Thomas Andros's Old Jersey Captive, 1781, Boston, 1833; Stiles's Brooklyn (50), vol. 1, pp. 331–376, one of the best accounts of life on the prison ships at Wallabout Bay; Henry R. Stiles's Letters from the Prisons and Prison Ships of the Revolution, New York, 1863; An Account of the Interment of the Remains of 11,500 American Seamen, Soldiers, and Citizens, . . . Who Fell Victims to the Cruelties of the British on Board Their Prison Ships at the Wallabout Bay, New York, 1808, and reprinted with notes by Henry R. Stiles, New York, 1865; Worthington C. Ford's British and American Prisoners of War, 1778, in Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, vol. 17(1893), pp. 159–174, 316–324, published in book form by the Historical Printing Club, Brooklyn, 1897.

94 Sparks, Jared. Count Casimir Pulaski. Boston, 1844.

95 Spears, John R. Anthony Wayne (New York, 1903), chaps. 7–12.

96 Stillé, Charles J. Major-General Anthony Wayne and the Pennsylvania Line in the Continental Army. Philadelphia, 1893.

97 Tower, Charlemagne, Jr. The Marquis de La Fayette in the American Revolution (Philadelphia, 1895, 2 vols.), vol. 1, pp. 1–257. An admirable work, containing much material not elsewhere available in English 98 Tuckerman, Bayard. Life of General Lafayette. New York, 1889, 2 vols.

CHAPTER IV — SARATOGA

Note.— See the note on page 449, and titles 3, 5, 9, 14, 17, 19, 21, 27, 30, 31, 34, 37, 45, 46, 47, 52, 57, 86.

99 Almon, John. The Remembrancer; or Impartial Repository of Public Events. A monthly publication. London, 1775–84, 17 vols.

100 Anburey, Thomas. Travels through the Interior Parts of America. London, 1789, 2 vols. Anburey was an officer under Burgoyne; his letters throw light upon the campaign and upon the life of the "convention troops."

101 Baxter, James P. The British Invasion from the North. The Campaigns of Generals Carleton and Burgoyne from Canada, 1776–1777. With the Journal of Lieutenant William Digby. Albany, 1888.

102 Brief Examination of the Plan and Conduct of the Northern Expedition in America in 1777, and of the Surrender of the Army under the Command of Lieutenant-General Burgoyne. London, 1779. A severe attack on Burgoyne. Also see article by Capt. George S. Simonds, entitled, New Light on the Campaign in Canada under Sir Guy Carleton in 1776, and Burgoyne's Expedition from Canada in 1777, printed in Journal of the United States Infantry Association, November, 1907.

103 Burgoyne, John. Orderly Book. Edited by E. B. O'Callaghan. Albany, 1867.

104 Burgoyne, John. A State of the Expedition from Canada as Laid before the House of Commons, and Verified by Evidence, with a Collection of Authentic Documents. London, 1780. Contains Burgoyne's defense.

105 Burgoyne, John. A Supplement to the State of the Expedition from Canada, Containing Gen. Burgoyne's orders Respecting the Principal Movements and Operations of the Army to the Raising of the Siege of Ticonderoga. London, 1780.

106 Campbell, William W. Annals of Tryon County; or, the Border Warfare of New York during the Revolution. New York, 1831. Most attention is given to the events in the Cherry Valley, but the other border conflicts receive notice.

107 Clinton, George. Public Papers, edited by Hugh Hastings. New York and Albany, 1899–1904, 7 vols.

108 Dawson, Henry B. Battles of the United States. New York, c. 1858, 2 vols.

109 Deane, Charles. Lieut.-Gen. John Burgoyne and the Convention of Saratoga, in Proceedings of the American Antiquarian Society, Worcester, Massachusetts, for October 22, 1877.

110 De Peyster, J. Watts. Oriskany, in Magazine of American History, vol. 2(1878), pp. 22–29.

111 Documents in Relation to the Part Taken by Vermont in Resisting the Invasion of Burgoyne, in Collections of Vermont Historical Society, vol. 1.

112 Drake, Samuel A. Burgoyne's Invasion of 1777, with an Outline Sketch of the American Invasion of Canada, 1775–76. Boston, 1889. Intended primarily for young readers but interesting to all.

113 Eelking, Max von. Memoirs and Letters and Journals of Major-General Riedesel. Translated from the German by William L. Stone Jr. Albany, 1868, 2 vols. Written by the German officer who commanded the Brunswick contingent.

114 Enquiry and Remarks upon the Conduct of Lieutenant-General Burgoyne. London, 1780.

115 Essay on Modern Martyrs, with a Letter to General Burgoyne, London, 1780. Blames Burgoyne for the failure of the expedition.

116 Fonblanque, Edward Barrington de. Political and Military Episodes in the Latter Half of the 18th Century; Derived from the Life and Correspondence of the Right Hon. John Burgoyne. London, 1876. "Extremely apologetic and explanatory in Burgoyne's behalf."

117 Graham, James. Life of General Daniel Morgan of the Virginia Line. New York, 1856.

118 Grosvenor, Edwin A. American Diplomacy, in Annual Report of American Historical Association for 1898 (Washington, 1899), pp. 285–300.

119 Hadden, James M. Journal Kept in Canada and upon Burgoyne's Campaign in 1776 and 1777. Edited by Horatio Rogers. Albany, 1884.

120 Lamb, Roger. A Journal of Occurrences during the late American War. Dublin, 1809. A valuable source-book.

121 Lingle, Charles R. The Treatment of Burgoyne's Troops under the Saratoga Convention, in Political Science Quarterly, vol. 22(1907), pp. 440–459. A careful study of the subject.

122 Lossing, Benson J. Life and Times of Philip Schuyler. New York, 1860–73, 2 vols.; new edition, 1884.

123 Lossing, Benson J. Pictorial Field-Book of the Revolution. New York, 1850, 2 vols.

124 Neilson, Charles. An Original, Compiled, and Corrected Account of Burgoyne's Campaign and the Memorable Battles of Bemis's Heights. Albany, 1844.

125 Pausch, Georg. Journal during the Burgoyne Campaign. Translated and annotated by William L. Stone with an introduction by Edward J. Lowell. Albany, 1886. The author was a Hessian officer in Burgoyne's army.

126 Proceedings of a General Court Martial, held at Whiteplains, N. Y., for the trial of Maj.-Gen. St. Clair, Aug. 25, 1778. Philadelphia, 1778. Reprinted in Collections of the New York Historical Society for 1880.

127 Proceedings of the General Court Martial for the Trial of Maj.-Gen. Schuyler, Oct. 1, 1778. Philadelphia, 1778.

128 Reid, W. Max. The Story of Old Fort Johnson (New York, 1906), chaps. 6–8. Contains a reprint of the journal of William Colbraith, a soldier in the Fort Schuyler garrison.

129 Riedesel, Friederike Charlotte Louise von Massow, Freiin von. Letters and Journals Relating to the War of the American Revolution. Translated by William L. Stone. Albany, 1867. The author was the wife of a Hessian general under Burgoyne.

130 Roberts, Ellis H. The Battle of Oriskany, Its Place in History, an Address at the Centennial Celebration, Aug. 6, 1877. Utica, 1877.

131 Smith, William H. The Life and Public Services of Arthur St. Clair, with his Correspondence and Other Papers. Cincinnati, 1882, 2 vols.

132 Stark, Caleb. Memoir and Official Correspondence of General John Stark. Concord, 1860.

133 Stone, William L., Jr. Ballads and Poems Relating to the Burgoyne Campaign. Albany, 1893.

134 Stone, William L., Jr. Campaign of Lieut.-Gen. John Burgoyne, and Expedition of Lieut.-Col. Barry St. Leger. Albany, 1877.

135 Stone, William L., Jr. Letters of Brunswick and Hessian Officers during the American Revolution. Albany, 1891. Most of the letters describe the events of Burgoyne's campaign and the captivity that ensued.

136 Stone, William L., Jr. Orderly Book of Sir John Johnson during the Oriskany Campaign, 1776–1777. Albany, 1882.

137 Stone, William L., Jr. Schuyler's Faithful Spy, in Magazine of American History, vol. 2(1878), pp. 414–419.

138 Stone, William L., Sr. Life of Joseph Brant—Thayendanegea, Including the Border Wars of the American Revolution, etc. New York, 1838, 2 vols.; new edition, Albany, 1865, 2 vols.

139 Tarbox, Increase N. Life of Israel Putnam. Boston, 1876.

140 Tuckerman, Bayard. Life of General Philip Schuyler (New York, 1905), chaps. 6–7.

141 Tyler, Moses C. Francis Hopkinson, in his Literary History of the American Revolution (199), vol. 2, pp. 130–157.

142 Walworth, Ellen H. Battles of Saratoga. Albany, 1891. Also see Magazine of American History, vol. 1(1877), p. 273.

143 Wilkinson, James. Memoirs of my Own Times. Philadelphia, 1816, 3 vols. "An historical source comparable in authority to the writings of . . . the lamented Baron Munchausen."

CHAPTER V — FOREIGN RELATIONS AND THE FRENCH ALLIANCE

NOTE. — See the note on page 449, and titles 14, 15, 21, 27, 30, 37, 52, 54, 78, 97.

144 ANNUAL REGISTER. London. "A record of events covering every year from 1758 down."

145 Deane, Silas. PAPERS, 1774–90, in Collections of New York Historical Society, fund series, vols. 19–23. New York, 1887–91. Volume one contains a biography of Deane.

146 Donne, W. Bodham, editor. CORRESPONDENCE OF GEORGE III. WITH LORD NORTH. London, 1867, 2 vols.

147 Durand, John, editor. NEW MATERIALS FOR THE HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION. New York, 1889. Valuable as supplementing Doniol's monumental work (78).

148 Foster, John W. A CENTURY OF AMERICAN DIPLOMACY (Boston and New York, 1900), chap. 1.

149 Franklin, Benjamin. COMPLETE WORKS. Edited by John Bigelow. New York, 1887–89, 10 vols.

150 Frederick the Great. ŒUVRES POSTHUMES. Berlin, 1788, 18 vols. There is an English translation by Thomas Holcroft, London, 1789, 13 vols.

151 Hale, Edward E., and Edward E., Jr. FRANKLIN IN FRANCE. Boston, 1887–88, 2 vols.

152 Harris, James, Earl of Malmesbury. DIARIES AND CORRESPONDENCE. London, 1844, 4 vols. Harris was British minister to Russia from 1776 to 1783.

153 Haworth, Paul L. FREDERICK THE GREAT AND THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION, in American Historical Review, vol. 9(1904), pp. 460–478.

154 Kapp, Friedrich. FRIEDRICH DER GROSSE UND DIE VEREINIGTEN STAATEN VON AMERIKA. Leipzig, 1871. An exaggeration of Frederick's friendship for America.

155 Lee, Charles H. VINDICATION OF ARTHUR LEE. New York, 1894. A partisan work.

156 Lee, Richard H. LIFE OF ARTHUR LEE. Boston, 1829, 2 vols.

157 Lee, William. LETTERS, 1766–83. Edited by Worthington C. Ford. Brooklyn, 1892, 3 vols.

158 Loménie, Louis Leonard de. BEAUMARCHAIS AND HIS TIMES. Translated from the French by Henry S. Edwards. London, 1856, 4 vols. Boston, 1857, 1 vol. Translation by F. Lyster, New York, 1895.

159 Lowell, Edward J. RELATIONS WITH EUROPE DURING THE REVOLUTION, in Winsor's America (7), vol. 7, chap. 1.

160 Moore, John B. AMERICAN DIPLOMACY, ITS SPIRIT AND ACHIEVEMENTS (New York, 1905), chap. 1.

161 Morse, John T., Jr. Benjamin Franklin. Boston, 1889.

162 Parton, James. Life and Times of Benjamin Franklin. New York, 1864, 2 vols.

163 Soules, François. Histoire des troubles de l'Amérique anglaise. Paris, 1787, 4 vols. A curiosity rather than an authority.

164 Sparks, Jared, editor. Diplomatic Correspondence of the American Revolution. Boston, 1829–30, 12 vols. The collection has been largely superseded by Wharton's better work (168).

165 Stevens, Benjamin F. Facsimiles of Manuscripts in European Archives Relating to America, 1773–83. London, 1889–98, 25 vols.

166 Turgot, A. R. J. Œuvres. Paris, 1808–11, 9 vols.

167 Walpole, Horace. Journal of the Reign of King George III., 1771–83. Edited by John Doran. London, 1859, 2 vols. Especially valuable for English politics of the period.

168 Wharton, Francis, editor. The Revolutionary Diplomatic Correspondence of the United States. Washington, 1889, 6 vols. The most valuable collection of diplomatic material relating to the period.

CHAPTER VI—NEW GOVERNMENTS, STATE AND CONFEDERATE

Note.—See the note on page 449, and titles 15, 27, 54, 67, 149.

169 Articles of Confederation. The text is printed in the appendix to this volume, pp. 439–444; and in Poore's Constitutions (191), vol. 1, pp. 7–12; MacDonald's Select Documents of United States History, 1776–1861 (New York, 1897), pp. 6–15; Preston's Documents Illustrative of American History (New York, 1886), pp. 218–231; Old South Leaflets (Boston), No. 2; American History Leaflets (New York, 1892–96), No. 20, pp. 7–27. For proposals to amend the articles, see American History Leaflets, No. 28. Franklin's draft of 1775 was cited in the bibliography for chap. 16, vol. 5, of this history.

170 Adams, John. Works. Edited by Charles F. Adams. Boston, 1850–56, 10 vols.

171 Adams, John, and Abigail. Familiar Letters during the Revolution. Edited by Charles F. Adams. Boston, c. 1875.

172 Burgess, John W. Political Science and Constitutional Law (Boston, 1890, 2 vols.), vol. 1, pp. 98–102.

173 Curtis, George T. Constitutional History of the United States (New York, 1889–95, 2 vols.), vol. 1, pp. 1–104.

174 Cushing, Harry A. History of the Transition from Provincial to Commonwealth Government in Massachusetts, in Columbia University Studies, vol. 7, No. 1, New York, 1896.

175 Farrand, Max. The Delaware Bill of Rights, in American Historical Review, vol. 3(1898), pp. 641–649.

176 Fisher, Sydney G. The Evolution of the Constitution of the United States (Philadelphia, 1897), pp. 11–215.

177 Fiske, John. Civil Government in the United States, Considered with Some Reference to its Origins (Boston, 1890), pp. 140–166, 187–208.

178 Ford, Paul L. Some Materials for a Bibliography of the Official Publications of the Continental Congress, 1774–89, in Boston Public Library Bulletins, vol. 8, pp. 320–323; vol. 9, pp. 299–304, 487–491; vol. 10, pp. 87–92, 156–166.

179 Friedenwald, Herbert. Journal and Papers of the Continental Congress, in Annual Report of the American Historical Association for 1896 (Washington, 1897), vol. 1, pp. 83–135.

180 Frothingham, Richard. Rise of the Republic of the United States. Boston, 1872. 6th ed., 1895.

181 Gordon, Thomas F. The History of New Jersey (Trenton, 1834), chap. 12.

182 Harding, Samuel B. Party Struggles over the First Pennsylvania Constitution, in Annual Report of American Historical Association for 1894 (Washington, 1895), pp. 371–402.

183 Harley, Lewis R. Life of Charles Thomson. Philadelphia, 1900. Thomson was the secretary of the continental congress.

184 Holst, Hermann E. von. Constitutional Law of the United States of America. Translated by A. B. Mason. Chicago, 1887.

185 Holst, Hermann E. von. Constitutional and Political History of the United States. Translated by John J. Lalor and others. Chicago, 1877–92, 8 vols.; new ed., 1899.

186 Jameson, John A. The Constitutional Convention: Its History, Powers, and Modes of Proceeding. New York, 1866; Chicago, 1887.

187 Jameson, John F., editor. Essays in the Constitutional History of the United States in the Formative Period, 1785–89. Boston, 1889.

188 Jefferson, Thomas. Writings. Edited by Paul L. Ford. New York, 1892–99, 10 vols.

189 Lalor, John J., editor. Cyclopædia of Political Science, Political Economy, and of the Political History of the United States (Chicago, 1881–84, 3 vols.). Consult especially articles on Confederation, Articles of; Congress, Continental; and State Sovereignty.

190 Morey, William C. First State Constitutions, in Publications of American Academy of Political Science, Philadelphia, 1892.

191 Poore, Benjamin P. Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters, and other Organic Laws of the United States. Washington, 1877, 2 vols.

192 Sikes, Enoch W. The Transition of North Carolina from Colony to Commonwealth, in Johns Hopkins University Studies, series 16, Nos. 10, 11. Baltimore, 1898.

193 Silver, John A. The Provisional Government of Maryland, in Johns Hopkins University Studies, series 13, No. 10. Baltimore, 1895.

194 Small, Albion W. Beginnings of American Nationality: the Constitutional Relations between the Continental Congress and the Colonies and States, 1774–89, in Johns Hopkins University Studies, series 8, Nos. 1, 2. Baltimore, 1890.

195 State Land Claims and Cessions. See American History Leaflets (169), No. 22.

196 Story, Joseph. Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States. Boston, 1833, 3 vols.; revised by Thomas M. Cooley, Boston, 1873, 2 vols.; revised by Melville M. Bigelow, Boston, 1891, 2 vols. A classic work by one of the greatest of American jurists.

197 Thom, William T. Struggle for Religious Freedom in Virginia, in Johns Hopkins University Studies, series 18, Nos. 10, 11, 12. Baltimore, 1900.

198 Thorpe, Francis N. Constitutional History of the American People, 1776–1850. New York, 1898, 2 vols.

199 Tyler, Moses C. Literary History of the American Revolution, 1763–1783. Contains much valuable material bearing on political matters.

200 Van Tyne, Claude H. Sovereignty in the American Revolution: an Historical Study, in American Historical Review, vol. 12(1907), pp. 529–545.

201 Webster, William C. State Constitutions of the American Revolution, in Publications of American Academy of Political and Social Science, Philadelphia, 1897.

CHAPTER VII — VALLEY FORGE, MONMOUTH, AND NEWPORT

Note. — See the note on page 449, and titles 5, 9, 14, 21, 31, 37, 52, 57, 65, 66, 70, 73, 74, 78, 84, 85, 86, 91, 97.

202 Barrow, John. Life of Richard, Earl Howe. London, 1838.

203 Bean, Theodore W. Washington at Valley Forge One Hundred Years Ago. Norristown, Pa., 1876. A careful work containing admirable maps.

204 Bolton, Charles K. The Private Soldier under Washington. New York, 1902.

205 Candid and Impartial Narrative of the Transactions of the Fleet under Lord Howe. London, 1779. Tells of Howe's movements during the Newport campaign.

206 De Peyster, J. Watts. The Battle of Monmouth, in Magazine of American History, vol. 2(1878), pp. 407–413.

207 Ellet, Elizabeth F. The Women of the American Revolution. Philadelphia, 1900, 2 vols.

208 Hinsdale, Burke A. The Old Northwest (revised edition, Boston, New York, and Chicago, 1898), chaps. 11, 12.

209 Haworth, Paul L. How the Revolution was Paid for, in The Van Norden Magazine, vol. 1(1907), No. 11, pp. 40, 41.

210 Kapp, Friedrich. Life of Frederick William von Steuben. New York, 1859.

211 Laurens, John. Army Correspondence, 1777–1778. New York, 1867.

212 McGeorge, Isabella C. A New Jersey Heroine of the Revolution, in American Monthly Magazine, vol. 17(1900), pp. 409–415.

213 Thacher, James. Military Journal during the American Revolutionary War, 1775–83. Boston, 1823, 1827.

214 Washington, George. Orderly Book, kept at Valley Forge, May 18–June 11, 1778. Boston, 1908.

CHAPTER VIII — BORDER WARFARE AND THE CONQUEST OF THE NORTHWEST

Note.—See the note on page 449, and titles 14, 15, 106, 138, 208.

215 Alvord, Clarence W. Father Pierre Gibault and Vincennes, 1778, in American Historical Review, vol. 14(1909), pp. 544–557.

216 Anderson, James H. Colonel William Crawford, in Publications of Ohio Archæological and Historical Society, vol. 6 (1898), pp. 1–34.

217 Avery, Catherine H. T. Elizabeth Zane, in American Monthly Magazine, vol. 17(1900), pp. 229–237.

218 Baldwin, Charles C. Francis Vigo and Gen. George Rogers Clark, in Magazine of Western History, vol. 1(1885), pp. 230–235.

219 Beckwith, H. W. General George Rogers Clark's Conquest of the Illinois, in Collections of Illinois State Historical Library, vol. 1(Springfield, 1903), pp. 172–289. The article is followed by valuable transcripts from the Canadian archives.

220 Boyd, Carl E. The County of Illinois, in American Historical Review, vol. 4(1899), pp. 623–635.

221 Butterfield, Consul W. History of George Rogers Clark's Conquest of the Illinois, etc. Columbus, 1904.

222 Butterfield, Consul W. History of the Girtys. Cincinnati, 1890.

223 Clark, George R. Sketch of His Campaign in the Illinois in 1778–9; with an Introduction by Henry Pirtle. Cincinnati, 1869. The account is in the form of a letter to George Mason. Major John Bowman's Journal of the expedition against Vincennes is also included. Also see Old South Leaflets (169), No. 43, and Cyrus T. Brady's article in McClure's Magazine, vol. 19(1902), p. 274. The Journal of Capt. Henry Hamilton (Detroit to Vincennes, August, 1778–June, 1779) is in the library of Harvard University.

224 Collins, Lewis. History of Kentucky. Louisville, 1874, 2 vols. The work was revised and brought down to 1874 by his son, Richard H. Collins.

225 Cone, Mary. The Expedition and Conquest of General George Rogers Clark, in Magazine of Western History, vol. 2 (1885), pp. 133–155.

226 Conover, George S., editor. Journals of the Military Expedition of Major-General John Sullivan against the Six Nations of Indians in 1779; with Records of Centennial Celebrations. Auburn, N. Y., 1887.

227 Doddridge, Joseph. Notes on the Settlement and Indian Wars of the Western Parts of Virginia and Pennsylvania, 1763–83, with a View of the State of Society and Manners of the First Settlers of the Western Country. Wellsburgh, Va., 1824; Albany, 1876.

228 Dunn, Jacob P., Jr. Indiana. Boston, 1888.

229 Durrett, Reuben T. Bryan's Station and the Memorial Proceedings Held on its Site. Louisville, 1897.

230 English, William H. Conquest of the Country Northwest of the River Ohio, 1778–1783, and Life of Gen. George Rogers Clark. Indianapolis, 1896, 2 vols. The most extended account of Clark's career and services that has yet appeared.

231 Farrar, William M. The Moravian Massacre, in Publications of Ohio Archæological and Historical Society, vol. 3(1890), pp. 271–297.

232 Filson, John. Discovery, Settlement, and Present State of Kentucky. Wilmington, 1784.

233 Haas, Wills de. History of the Early Settlement and Indian Wars of Western Virginia. Wheeling, 1851.

234 Haywood, John. Civil and Political History of Tennessee. Knoxville, 1823; Nashville, 1891.

235 Hill, N. N. Crawford's Campaign, in Magazine of Western History, vol. 2(1885), pp. 19–38.

236 Hosmer, James K. A Short History of the Mississippi Valley. Boston, 1901.

237 Howells, William D. Gnadenhutten, in Atlantic Monthly, vol. 23(1869), pp. 95–115.

238 Huebner, Francis C. The Moravian Missions in Ohio. Washington, 1898.

239 McClung, John A. Sketches of Western Adventure Connected with the Settlement of the West, 1755–94. Maysville, Ky., 1832; Covington, Ky., 1872.

240 Moore, Charles. The Northwest under Three Flags. New York, 1900.

241 Old Fort Massac, in American Monthly Magazine, vol. 26 (1905), p. 177.

242 Parrish, Randall. Historic Illinois (Chicago, 1905), chap. 14.

243 Poole, William F. The West, in Winsor's America (7), vol. 6, pp. 715–736.

244 Ramsey, James G. M. Annals of Tennessee. Charleston, 1853.

245 Rayder, Horace E. Oliver Pollock, in Magazine of American History, vol. 22(1889), pp. 414–420.

246 Roosevelt, Theodore. The Winning of the West (New York, 1889–96, 4 vols.), vol. 1, pp. 97–100. [The Moravian Indians.]

247 Shaler, Nathaniel S. Kentucky. Boston, 1885.

248 Shimmel, Lewis S. Border Warfare in Pennsylvania during the Revolution. Harrisburg, 1901.

249 Stone, William L., Sr. Border Wars of the American Revolution. New York, 1843, 2 vols.

250 Sullivan, John. Centennial Celebration of General Sullivan's Campaign against the Iroquois in 1779. Waterloo, N. Y., 1880.

251 Taylor, James W. History of the State of Ohio: First Period, 1650–1787. Cincinnati, 1854.

252 Thwaites, Reuben G. Daniel Boone. New York, 1902.

253 Thwaites, Reuben G. How George Rogers Clark Won the Northwest and other Essays in Western History. Chicago, 1903.

254 Walters, Michael. Journal of the [Crawford] Expedition against Sandusky, in Publications of Western Reserve Historical Society, vol. 4(1899), Tract No. 89.

255 Weeks, Stephen B. General Joseph Martin and the War of the Revolution in the West, in Annual Report of American Historical Association for 1893 (Washington, 1895), pp. 401–477.

256 Winsor, Justin. The Mississippi Basin, 1697–1763 (Boston, 1895), chaps. 8–12.

257 Withers, Alexander S. Chronicles of Border Warfare. Clarksburg, Va., 1831; new edition, edited by Reuben G. Thwaites, Cincinnati, 1895.

CHAPTER IX—THE SECOND ATTEMPT UPON THE SOUTH

Note.—See the note on page 449, and titles 5, 14, 21, 37, 52, 78, 85, 123, 246.

258 Channing, Edward. The War in the Southern Department, in Winsor's America (7), vol. 6, chap. 6.

259 Cruger, Col. John H. The Siege of Savannah, 1779, a contemporary account, in Magazine of American History, vol. 2 (1878), pp. 489–492.

260 De Peyster, J. Watts. The Affair at King's Mountain, in Magazine of American History, vol. 5(1880), pp. 401–423.

261 Draper, Lyman C. King's Mountain and Its Heroes. Cincinnati, 1881. The most exhaustive study of the battle of King's Mountain yet made. Also gives an account of the campaign in the South from the fall of Charleston.

262 Gibbes, Robert W., editor. Documentary History of the American Revolution, Chiefly in South Carolina. New York, 1853–57, 3 vols. Valuable especially for Marion's career.

263 Harris, Joel C. Georgia. New York, 1896.

264 Henry, William W. The Scotch-Irish of the South, in Proceedings of the Scotch-Irish Congress for 1889 (Cincinnati, 1889), p. 120.

265 Johnson, Joseph. Traditions and Reminiscences, Chiefly of the American Revolution in the South, Particularly of the Upper Country. Charleston, 1851. The recollections of an old man, valuable only for lack of better evidence.

266 Jones, Charles C., Jr. History of Georgia. Boston, 1883, 2 vols.

267 Lossing, Benson J. The Marquis of Hastings [Lord Rawdon] in America, in Harper's Magazine, vol. 47(1873), pp. 15–26.

268 McCall, Hugh. History of Georgia. Savannah, 1811–16, 2 vols.

269 McCrady, Edward. History of South Carolina in the Revolution. New York, 1901.

270 Moore, John W. History of North Carolina. Raleigh, 1880, 2 vols.

271 Moultrie, William. Memoirs of the American Revolution, So Far As It Related to the States of North and South Carolina and Georgia. New York, 1802, 2 vols.

272 Prevost, Augustine. Journal of the Siege of Savannah in 1779, in Publications of the Southern Historical Association, vol. 1(1897), p. 259.

273 Ramsay, David. History of the Revolution of South Carolina from a British Colony to an Independent State. Trenton, 1785, 2 vols.

274 Russell, Peter. Journal of the Siege of Charleston, in American Historical Review, vol. 4(1899), pp. 478–501.

275 Schenck, David. North Carolina, 1780–81. Raleigh, 1889.

276 Siege of Charleston, see Charleston Year Book for 1897.

277 Stevens, William B. History of Georgia. Vol. 1, New York, 1847; vol. 2, Philadelphia, 1859.

278 Tarleton, Banastre. History of the Campaigns of 1780 and 1781 in the Southern Provinces of North America. London, 1787. Partisan but valuable.

279 Warfield, Ethelbert D. General William Campbell, the Hero of King's Mountain, in Magazine of Western History, vol. 5(1887), pp. 362–375.

280 Wheeler, John H. Historical Sketches of North Carolina, 1584–1851. Philadelphia, 1851, 2 vols.

281 White, George. Historical Collections of Georgia. New York, 1854.

CHAPTER X—THE WAR IN THE NORTH, 1779–80

Note.—See the note on page 449, and titles 3, 5, 14, 21, 22, 33, 37, 47, 52, 57, 74, 78, 87, 168.

282 Abbatt, William. Crisis of the Revolution: Being the Story of Arnold and André. New York, 1899.

283 Blanchard, Claude. Journal of Claude Blanchard, Commissary of the French Auxiliary Army Sent to the United States, 1780–83. Translated by William Duane and edited by Thomas Balch. Albany, 1875.

284 Chandler, Peleg W. Proceedings of a Board of General Officers Respecting Major John André, in his American Criminal Cases (Boston, 1841–44, 2 vols.), vol. 1, p. 155 et seq.

285 Dawson, Henry B., editor. Papers concerning the Capture and Detention of Major John André. Yonkers, 1866.

286 Deux Ponts, Guillaume, comte de. My Campaigns in America: a Journal, 1780–81. Translated and edited by Samuel A. Green. Boston, 1868.

287 Dykman, J. O. The Last Twelve Days of Major John André, in Magazine of American History, vol. 21(1889), pp. 494–498, and vol. 22(1889), pp. 49–57, 148–157.

288 Johnston, Henry P. The Storming of Stony Point. New York, 1900.

289 Journal of the Attack of the Rebels on His Majesty's Ships and Troops . . . 24th July, 1779, at Majabiquiduce in Penobscot Bay. From the Nova Scotia Gazette, Halifax, Sept. 14, 1779, in Collections of the Maine Historical Society, vol. 7(Bath, 1876), pp. 121–126.

290 Lossing, Benson J. The Romance of the Hudson, in Harper's Magazine, vol. 52(1876), pp. 822–837.

291 Sargent, Winthrop. Life and Career of Major John André. Boston, 1861; New York, 1871.

292 Smith, Horace W. Andreana. Philadelphia, 1866. A collection of sources including the proceedings at André's trial. Philadelphia, 1865.

293 Sparks, Jared. Correspondence Concerning Arnold and André (and other documents), in Magazine of American History, vol. 3(1879), pp. 747–759.

294 Stevens, John A. The Seventy-Six Stone-House at Tappan, in Magazine of American History, vol. 3(1879), pp. 743–746.

295 Stockbridge, J. C. The Case of Major André, in Magazine of American History, vol. 3(1879), pp. 739–742.

296 Winsor, Justin. The Treason of Arnold, in America (7), vol. 6, pp. 447–468.

CHAPTER XI — ON THE SEA

Note. — See the note on page 449, and titles 15, 21, 27, 36, 37, 42, 52, 57, 145, 149, 151, 168, 170.

297 Beatson, Robert. Naval and Military Memoirs of Great Britain, 1727–1783. London, 1804.

298 Boston Gazette for 1775–1783. Of great value in studying the movements of the continental vessels.

299 Brady, Cyrus T. Commodore Paul Jones. New York, 1902.

300 Buell, Augustus C. Paul Jones, Founder of the American Navy. New York, 1900, 2 vols. Interesting but inaccurate, a mingling of fact and fiction.

301 Connecticut Gazette. New London, 1775–83.

302 Cooper, James F. History of the Navy of the United States of America. London, 1839.

303 Field, Edward. Esek Hopkins. Providence, 1898. Also see his Revolutionary Defences in Rhode Island. Providence, 1896.

304 Griffin, Martin I. J. Commodore John Barry. Philadelphia, 1903.

305 Hale, Edward E. The Naval History of the American Revolution, in Winsor's America (7), vol. 6, pp. 563–604.

306 Jones, Charles H. Gustavus Conyngham. Philadelphia, 1903.

307 Jones, Paul. Memoirs. Edinburgh, 1830, 2 vols.; London, 1843, 2 vols. Largely compiled from papers in the possession of his relatives in Scotland.

308 Lincoln, Charles H. Calendar of John Paul Jones Manuscripts in the Library of Congress. Washington, 1903.

309 Lincoln, Charles H. Naval Records of the American Revolution, 1775–1778. Washington, 1906.

310 Maclay, Edgar S. History of American Privateers. New York, 1899.

311 Maclay, Edgar S. A History of the United States Navy (New York, 1894, 2 vols.; new ed., revised and enlarged, 1898–1901, 3 vols.), vol. 1, part 1.

312 Mahan, Alfred T. The Influence of Sea Power upon History, 1660–1783 (Boston, 1890), chaps. 9–14.

313 Mahan, Alfred T. John Paul Jones in the Revolution, in Scribner's Magazine, vol. 24(1898), pp. 22–36, 204–219.

314 Marion, H. John Paul Jones' Last Cruise and Final Resting Place. Washington, 1906.

315 Pennsylvania Packet. Philadelphia, 1775–83.

316 Porter, Horace. Recovery of the Body of John Paul Jones, in Century Magazine, vol. 48(1905), pp. 927–955.

317 Sheppard, John H. Commodore Samuel Tucker. Boston, 1868.

318 Spears, John R. History of Our Navy. New York, 1897–99, 5 vols.

319 Waite, Henry E., compiler. Extracts Relating to the Origin of the American Navy. Boston, 1890.

CHAPTER XII — EUROPEAN COMPLICATIONS — THE ARMED NEUTRALITY

Note. — See the note on page 449, and titles 14, 21, 37, 52, 78, 144, 150, 153, 159, 165, 168, 170, 311.

320 Bergbohn, Carl. Die Bewaffnete Neutralitat, 1780–1783. Berlin, 1884.

321 Circourt, Adolph de. Histoire de l'Action Commune de la France et de l'Amerique pour l'Indépendance des États Unis. Paris, 1876, 3 vols.

322 A Collection of Publick Acts and Papers, Relating to the Principles of armed Neutrality . . . London, 1801.

323 An Explanation of the Case Relating to the Capture of Saint Eustatius. London, 1786.

324 Goertz, Count von. Historische und Politische Denkwürdigkeiten des preussischen Staatsministers J. E. Grafen von Goertz. Stuttgart and Tübingen, 1827–28, 2 vols. Goertz was the Prussian representative at the Russian court.

325 Hannay, David. Admiral Rodney. London and New York, 1891.

326 Jay, William. The Life of John Jay. New York, 1833.

327 Jameson, J. Franklin. St. Eustatius in the American Revolution, in American Historical Review, vol. 8(1903), pp. 683–708.

328 Johnston, Henry P., editor. The Correspondence and Public papers of John Jay. New York, 1890–93, 4 vols.

329 Malmesbury, Earl of. Diaries and Correspondence of James Harris, First Earl of Malmesbury. London, 1844, 4 vols. Harris was the British minister at St. Petersburg.

330 Mundy, Godfrey B. Life and Correspondence of Lord Rodney. London, 1830, 2 vols.

331 Pellew, George. John Jay (Boston, 1890), chap. 6.

332 Whitelock, William. The Life and Times of John Jay (New York, 1887), chap. 11.

333 Winsor, Justin. The Westward Movement. Boston, 1899.

CHAPTER XIII—THE RECLAMATION OF THE CAROLINAS

Note.—See the note on page 449, and titles 12, 14, 18, 21, 30, 37, 52, 54, 57, 117, 263, 269, 273, 275, 278.

334 Cornwallis, Charles. Proclamation of March 18, 1781, in Magazine of American History, vol. 7(1881), p. 45.

335 English, Thomas D. The Battle of the Cowpens, in Harper's Magazine, vol. 22(1861), p. 163.

336 Hay, P. D. Haunts of the Swamp Fox, in Harper's Magazine, vol. 67(1883), pp. 545–557.

337 Lee, Henry. Memoirs. Philadelphia, 1812; New York, 1869.

338 Ross, Charles, editor. Cornwallis's Correspondence. London, 1859, 3 vols.

339 Simms, William G. Life of Marion. New York, 1844.

340 Tucker, St. George. Guilford Court House. A contemporary account, in Magazine of American History, vol. 7(1881), p. 36. For another contemporary account, see Bulletin of New York Public Library for November, 1905.

CHAPTER XIV — THE FINAL BLOW

Note.— See the note on page 449, and titles 3, 14, 18, 19, 21, 30, 37, 52, 54, 57, 74, 87, 96, 97, 168, 206, 214, 275, 278, 286, 321, 337, 338.

341 Allyn, Charles. The Battle of Groton Heights. New London, 1882.

342 Avery, Frank M. A Single Page of History [Groton Heights], in American Monthly Magazine, vol. 32(1908), pp. 1–8.

343 Caulkins, Frances M. The History of New London. New London, 1852, 1860, 1895.

344 Clinton, Henry. The Narrative of Lieutenant-General Sir Henry Clinton, K. B., relative to His Conduct . . . Particularly to that which Respects the Unfortunate Issue of the Campaign of 1781, with an Appendix Containing Copies and Extracts of His Correspondence with Ld. G. Germain, Earl Cornwallis, etc. London, 1783. Reprinted, Philadelphia, 1865, as Narrative of the Campaign of 1781 in America.

345 Cornwallis, Charles. Answer to that part of the Narrative of Lieut.-Gen. Henry Clinton Which Relates to the Conduct of Lieut.-Gen. Earl Cornwallis during the Campaign in North America, 1781. London, 1783. Philadelphia, 1866. Contains a defense of Cornwallis's course and the correspondence between the two generals from January, 1781, to the time of the surrender.

346 Feltman, William. The Journal of Lieut. William Feltman of the First Pennsylvania Regiment, 1781–82, in Collections of the Pennsylvania Historical Society for 1853. Philadelphia, 1853.

347 Johnston, Henry P. The Surrender of Cornwallis, in Harper's Magazine, vol. 63(1881), pp. 323–345.

348 Johnston, Henry P. The Yorktown Campaign and the Surrender of Cornwallis, 1781. New York, 1881. The most exhaustive study of this campaign yet made.

349 King, Horatio. Tarleton's Raid, in Magazine of American History, vol. 22(1890), p. 165.

350 Laylin, Clarence D. The Firelands Grant (with map), in Publications of the Ohio Archæological and Historical Society, vol. 10(1902), pp. 435–450.

351 Rochambeau, Comte de. Memoirs Relative to the War of Independence of the United States. Translated by M. W. E. Wright. Paris, 1838.

352 Stevens, Benjamin F., editor. The Campaign in Virginia, 1781. An exact reprint of six rare pamphlets on the Clinton-Cornwallis controversy. London, 1888, 2 vols.

353 Stevens, John A. The Allies at Yorktown, in Magazine of American History, vol. 6(1881), pp. 1–53.

354 Stevens, John A. Operations of the Allied Armies before New York, 1781, in Magazine of American History, vol. 4 (1880), pp. 1–45.

355 Stevens, John A. Route of the Allies from King's Ferry to the Head of Elk, in Magazine of American History, vol. 5 (1880), pp. 1–20.

356 Winthrop, Robert C. Centennial Oration at Yorktown, 1881, in Report of the Commission for the Erection of a Commemorative Monument at Yorktown. Washington, 1883.

CHAPTER XV — THE SINEWS OF WAR

Note. — See the note on page 449, and titles 14, 21, 46, 149, 209.

357 Bayley, Rafel A. Foreign Subsidies and National Loans of the United States, in Tenth Census of the United States (Washington, 1884), vol. 7, pp. 295–486.

358 Bolles, Albert S. Financial History of the United States (New York, 1875–85, 3 vols.), vol. 1.

359 Breck, Samuel. Historical Sketch of Paper Money. Philadelphia, 1843.

360 Bronson, Henry. Historical Account of Connecticut Currency, Continental Money, and the Finances of the Revolution, in Papers of the New Haven Colony Historical Society (New Haven, 1865), vol. 1.

361 Bullock, Charles J. Finances of the United States, 1775–89, with Special Reference to the Budget. University of Wisconsin Bulletin (Madison, 1895), vol. 1, No. 2.

362 Dewey, Davis R. Financial History of the United States (London, 1903), chap. 2.

363 Eggleston, Edward. The Commerce of the Colonies, in Century Magazine, vol. 28(1884), pp. 246–256.

364 Lewis, Lawrence, Jr. History of the Bank of North America. Philadelphia, 1882.

365 Oberholtzer, Ellis P. Robert Morris, Patriot and Financier. New York, 1903.

366 Phillips, Henry, Jr. Historical Sketches of the Paper Currency of the American Colonies Prior to the Adoption of the Federal Constitution. Roxbury, Mass., 1865–66, 2 vols.

367 Schuckers, Jacob W. Brief Account of the Finances and Paper Money of the Revolutionary War. Philadelphia, 1874.

368 Sumner, William G. The Financier and the Finances of the American Revolution. New York, 1891, 2 vols.

369 Sumner, William G. History of American Currency. New York, 1874; new edition, 1876.

370 Webster, Pelatiah. Political Essays. Philadelphia, 1791. Also see Old South Leaflets (169), No. 186.

For a fuller bibliography of the continental finances, see Winsor's America (7), vol. 7, p. 81, note 4.

CHAPTER XVI — THE TORIES IN WAR TIME

Note. — See the note on page 449, and title 55.

371 Ellis, George E. The Loyalists and their Fortunes, in Winsor's America (7), vol. 7, pp. 185–214.

372 Flick, Alexander C. Loyalism in New York during the American Revolution. New York, 1901.

373 Gilbert, George A. The Connecticut Loyalists, in American Historical Review, vol. 4(1899), pp. 273–291.

374 Ryerson, Egerton. The Loyalists of America and Their Times, 1620–1816. Toronto, 1880, 2 vols. The author was the son of a New Jersey Tory exile.

375 Sabine, Lorenzo. Biographical Sketches of Loyalists of the American Revolution. Boston, 1864, 2 vols.

CHAPTER XVII — PEACE

Note. — See the note on page 449, and titles 7, 14, 21, 30, 37, 46, 52, 118, 146, 148, 149, 151, 167, 168, 321, 326, 328, 331.

376 Dwight, Theodore F. The Treaty for which the Army Waited, in Magazine of American History, vol. 10(1883), pp. 381–385.

377 Fiske, John. The Critical Period of American History (Boston, 1888), chap. 1.

378 Fitzmaurice, Edmond. Life of Shelburne. London, 1875–76, 3 vols.

379 Gardiner, Asa B. The Last Cantonment of the Main Continental Army of the Revolution, in Magazine of American History, vol. 10(1883), pp. 355–380.

380 Headley, Joel T. The Last Days of Washington's Army at Newburgh, in Harper's Magazine, vol. 67(1883), pp. 651–672.

381 Hinsdale, Burke A. Bounding the Original United States, in Magazine of Western History, vol. 2(1885), pp. 401–423. Also printed separately.

382 Hinsdale, Burke A. The Northwest Wrested from England, in The Old Northwest (208), chap. 10.

383 Jay, John. The Peace Negotiations of 1782–83, in Papers of American Historical Association, vol. 3, pp. 79–100.

384 Johnston, Henry P. Evacuation of New York by the British, 1783, in Harper's Magazine, vol. 67(1883), pp. 909–923.

385 McLaughlin, Andrew C. The Confederation and the Constitution (New York, 1905), chaps. 1–2.

386 Morse, John T., Jr. John Adams. Boston, 1887.

387 Negro Soldiers. See William C. Nell's The Colored Patriots of the American Revolution, Boston, 1855; Benjamin Cowell's Spirit of '76 in Rhode Island (Boston, 1850), p. 159; Rhode Island Colonial Records, vol. 8, pp. 359, 360, 363; Kent's Commentaries, vol. 2, p. 294; Hening's [Virginia] Statutes at Large, vol. 11, pp. 308, 309; George W. Williams's History of the Negro Race in America (New York, 1883, 2 vols.), vol. 1, pp. 324–412.

388 Treaty of Paris. The text of the preliminary treaty (with the secret article) is given in Wharton's Revolutionary Diplomatic Correspondence of the United States (168), vol. 6, pp. 96–100. For the text of the definitive treaty, see MacDonald's Select Documents (169), pp. 15–21; Preston's Documents (169), pp. 232–239.

389 Turner, Frederick J. The Diplomatic Contest for the Mississippi, in Atlantic Monthly, vol. 93(1904), pp. 676–691, 807–817.

390 Washington, George. Address to Congress on Resigning his Commission, in his Writings (57), vol. 10, p. 338. See his Circular Letter to the Governors of all the States on Disbanding the Army, in Old South Leaflets (169), No. 15.

CHAPTER XVIII—DISABLED AND DRIFTING

Note.—See the note on page 449, and titles 27, 57, 143, 148, 169, 185, 246, 326, 328, 331, 360, 361, 362, 365, 368, 370, 377, 379, 380, 385.

391 Alden, George H. The State of Franklin, in American Historical Review, vol. 8(1903), pp. 271–289.

392 Arnold, Samuel G. History of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, 1636–1790. Fourth edition, Providence, 1894, 2 vols.

393 Avery, Samuel. The Susquehanna Controversy Examined. The Material Objections against the Connecticut Title or Claim Answered. Wilkes-Barre, Pa., 1803.

394 Barry, John S. History of Massachusetts. Boston, 1855–57, 3 vols. Contains an account of the Shays rebellion.

395 Bates, Frank G. Rhode Island and the Formation of the Union. Columbia University Studies, vol. 10, No. 2, New York, 1889.

396 Belknap, Jeremy. History of New Hampshire. Second edition, Boston, 1813, 3 vols.

397 Brown, John M. The Political Beginnings of Kentucky. Louisville, 1889.

398 Caldwell, Joshua W. Studies in the Constitutional History of Tennessee. Cincinnati, 1889.

399 Constitution of the State of Franklin, in the Charlotte (N. C.) Daily Observer, September 25, 1904, and the American Historical Magazine and Tennessee Historical Society Quarterly, October, 1904.

400 The Diplomatic Correspondence of the United States, 1783–1789. Washington, 1833–34, 7 vols.; also 1837, 3 vols.

401 Fiske, John. The Paper Money Craze of 1786 and the Shays Rebellion, in Atlantic Monthly, vol. 57(1886), pp. 376–385.

402 Gayarré, Charles E. A. History of Louisiana. New York, 1854–66, 4 vols.; 3d ed., enlarged, New Orleans, 1885, 4 vols.

403 Greene, Thomas M. The Spanish Conspiracy: a Review of Early Spanish Movements in the Southwest, Containing Proofs of the Intrigues of James Wilkinson and John Brown, etc. Cincinnati, 1891.

404 Hamilton, Alexander. Complete Works, edited by Henry C. Lodge. New York, 1885–86, 9 vols.

405 Hamilton, John C. History of the Republic of the United States as Traced in the Writings of Alexander Hamilton and of His Contemporaries. Boston, 1857–64 and later editions, 7 vols.

406 Hatch, Louis C. The Administration of the American Revolutionary Army, in Harvard Historical Studies, vol. 10, Boston, 1904.

407 Learned, Henry B. Origin of the Title Superintendent of Finance, in American Historical Review, vol. 10(1905), pp. 565–573.

408 Lossing, Benson J. Shays's Rebellion, in Harper's Magazine, vol. 24(1862), pp. 656–662.

409 McLaughlin, Andrew C. The Western Posts and the British Debts, in Annual Report of American Historical Association for 1894, pp. 413–444.

410 McMaster, John B. History of the People of the United States (New York, 1885–1906, 6 vols.), vol. 1, pp. 1–435.

411 Rives, William C. Life of James Madison. Boston, 1859–68, 3 vols.

412 Robinson, Rowland E. Vermont (Boston, 1892), pp. 139–249.

413 Schouler, James. History of the United States under the Constitution. New York, 1880–99, 6 vols.

414 Schuyler, Eugene. American Diplomacy and the Furtherance of Commerce. New York, 1886.

415 Shepherd, William R. Wilkinson and the Beginnings of the Spanish Conspiracy, in American Historical Review, vol. 9 (1904), pp. 490–506. Also see the same volume, pp. 533, and 748–766.

416 Turner, Frederick J. Western State Making in the Revolutionary Era, in American Historical Review, vol. 1(1895), pp. 70–87, 251–269. A suggestive study.

417 Walker, Francis A. The Making of the Nation, 1783–1817 (New York, 1895), chap. 1.

418 Warren, Joseph P. The Confederation and the Shays Rebellion, in American Historical Review, vol. 11(1905), pp. 42–67. Also see a short article by him in same magazine, vol. 2 (1897), p. 693.

419 Weeden, William B. Economic and Social History of New England, 1620–1789. Boston, 1890, 2 vols.

420 Western Land Cessions. See documents in American History Leaflets (169), No. 22.

421 Winsor, Justin. The Confederation, 1781–1789, in America (7), vol. 7, pp. 215–236.

CHAPTER XIX—OPENING THE WEST; THE ORDINANCE OF 1787

Note.—See the note on page 449, and titles 27, 57, 92, 208, 230, 246, 333, 377, 385, 409, 416. Also see state histories of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Kentucky, and Tennessee.

422 Adams, Herbert B. Maryland's Influence upon Land Cessions to the United States, in Johns Hopkins University Studies, series 3, No. 1.

423 Barrett, Jay A. Evolution of the Ordinance of 1787, with an Account of the Earlier Plans for the Government of the Northwest Territory, in University of Nebraska Seminary Papers, No. 1, 1891.

424 Buell, Rowena. Memoirs of Rufus Putnam. Boston, 1903.

425 Coles, Edward. History of the Ordinance of 1787, in Publications of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania. Philadelphia, 1856.

426 Cone, Maria. The First Settlement in Ohio, in Magazine of American History, vol. 6(1881), pp. 241–259.

427 Connecticut Cession. The text of the act and deed of cession is given in Publications of Ohio Archæological and Historical Society, vol. 5(1897), pp. 48, 49.

428 Cutler, William P. The Ordinance of 1787, in Publications of Ohio Archæological and Historical Society, vol. 1(1887), pp. 10–37.

429 Cutler, William P., and Perkins, Julia. Life, Journals, and Correspondence of Rev. Manasseh Cutler. Cincinnati, 1888, 2 vols. Also see Dr. Cutler's Description of Ohio, in Old South Leaflets (169), No. 40; and in Publications of Ohio Archæological and Historical Society, vol. 3(1890), pp. 81–106.

430 Dawes, E. C. The Scioto Purchase, in Magazine of American History, vol. 22(1889), pp. 470–482.

431 Farrand, Max. The West and the Principles of the Revolution, in Yale Review for May, 1908.

432 Hinsdale, Burke A. The Ordinance of 1787, in Magazine of Western History, vol. 6(1887), pp. 259–277.

433 King, Rufus. Ohio, First Fruits of the Ordinance of 1787. Boston, 1888; new edition, 1903.

434 Knight, George W. History and Management of Land Grants for Education in the Northwest Territory, in Papers of American Historical Association (Washington, 1886), vol. 1, No. 3.

435 Mathews, Alfred. Ohio and her Western Reserve. New York, 1902.

436 Merriam, John M. The Legislative History of the Ordinance of 1787, in Proceedings of American Antiquarian Society (Worcester, Mass.), new series, vol. 5, p. 303 et seq.

437 Ohio Company and Marietta. Most of the titles cited in this bibliography for chapter 19 contain extended accounts that might be specified under this title. An account of Marietta's first centennial celebration, rich in historical material, is printed in Publications of Ohio Archæological and Historical Society, vol. 2(1888), p. 16 et seq. Also see an article by Martha J. Lamb, in Magazine of American History, vol. 20(1888), pp. 169–192; one by Alfred Mathews, in Magazine of Western History, vol. 1(1885), pp. 32–40; and one by L. A. Alderman, in same magazine, vol. 7(1888), pp. 537–547.

438 Ordinance of 1784. The text is given in Old South Leaflets (169), No. 127. Also see Bancroft's History of the Constitution (455), vol. 1, p. 156.

439 Ordinance of 1787. The text is given in Hinsdale's The Old Northwest (208), pp. 413–419; the St. Clair Papers (446); Poore's Charters and Constitutions (191), pp. 429–432; Magazine of Western History, vol. 1(1884), p. 56 et seq.; Curtis's Constitutional History (173), vol. 2, pp. 469–474; McDonald's Select Documents (169), pp. 21–29; Preston's Documents (169), pp. 240–250; Old South Leaflets (169), No. 13; Publications of Ohio Archæological and Historical Society, vol. 5(1897), pp. 50–57; etc.

440 Petition of Officers in the Continental Line for Ohio Lands, June, 1783 (text and list of signers), in Publications of Ohio Archæological and Historical Society, vol. 1(1888), pp. 37–46. The text of the petition is also given in Magazine of Western History, vol. 7(1888), p. 539.

441 Poole, William F. The Ordinance of 1787 and Dr. Manasseh Cutler as an Agent in Its Formation. Cambridge, 1876. Defends the claim of Cutler to the authorship of the Ordinance of 1787 as against that of Nathan Dane. Also see his article on the same subject in North American Review, vol. 122(1876), pp. 229–265.

442 Putnam, A. Waldo. History of Middle Tennessee; Life and Times of General James Robertson. Nashville, 1859.

443 Sato, Shosuke. History of the Land Question in the United States, in Johns Hopkins University Studies (Baltimore, 1886), series 4, Nos. 7–9.

444 Scioto Company and its Purchase, in Publications of Ohio Archæological and Historical Society, vol. 3(1890), pp. 107–136. Also see Theodore T. Belote's The Scioto Speculation and the French Settlement at Gallipolis. Cincinnati, 1908.

445 Smucker, Isaac. The Establishment of Civil Government Northwest of the River Ohio, in Magazine of Western History, vol. 8(1888), pp. 483–491, and vol. 9(1889), pp. 40–43.

446 Smith, William H., editor. The St. Clair Papers (Cincinnati, 1882, 2 vols.), vol. 2.

447 Treat, Payson J. Origin of the National Land System under the Confederation, in Annual Report of American Historical Association for 1905, vol. 1, pp. 231–239.

448 Turner, Frederick J. The Evolution of the American System of Forming and Admitting New States into the Union, in Annals of American Academy of Political and Social Science, vol. 18 (Philadelphia, 1901), pp. 469–479.

449 Virginia Cessions. The text of the act of cession, 1782, and the deed of cession, 1784, is given in Poore's Charters and Constitutions (191), pp. 427, 428. Also see Publications of Ohio Archæological and Historical Society, vol. 5(1897), pp. 46, 58, and State Land Claims and Cessions (195).

450 Washington, George. On the Opening of Communication with the West, in his Writings (57), vol. 10, pp. 402–414; and in Old South Leaflets (169), No. 16. Also see title 459.

451 Welling, James C. The States'-Rights Conflict over the Public Lands, in Papers of the American Historical Association, vol. 3, pp. 411–432.

452 Winsor, Justin, and Channing, Edward. Territorial Acquisitions and Divisions, in Winsor's America (7), vol. 7, pp. 527–539.

CHAPTER XX—BUILDING THE SHIP

Note.—See the note on page 449, and titles 173, 184, 185, 377, 385, 404, 409, 410, 413.

453 Alexander, Lucien H. James Wilson, Patriot, and the Wilson Doctrine, in the North American Review, vol. 183 (1906), No. 8. Also separately printed. Also see The Green Bag (Boston), vol. 19(1907), Nos. 1, 2, 3, 5. A volume commemorative of James Wilson was announced in 1907, but it had not been published when this volume went to press.

454 Ballagh, James C. Southern Economic History: Tariff and Public Lands, in Annual Report of American Historical Association for 1898.

455 Bancroft, George. History of the Formation of the Constitution of the United States of America. New York, 1882, 2 vols. Also published in one volume and as vol. 6 of the last revision of his History of the United States.

456 Documentary History of the Constitution of the United States of America, 1786–1870; Derived from the Records, Manuscripts, and Rolls, Deposited in the Bureau of Rolls and Library of the Department of State. Washington, 1894–1906, 5 vols. A valuable compilation containing a literal reprint of the proceedings of the Annapolis convention, the official journal of the federal convention, the material relating to the passage of the fifteen amendments, Madison's notes on the federal convention, and other important material.

457 Elliot, Jonathan. Debates on the Federal Constitution (Washington, 1845, 5 vols.; Philadelphia, 1861, 5 vols.), vol. 5.

458 Farrand, Max. Compromises of the Constitution, in American Historical Review, vol. 9(1904), pp. 479–489.

459 Farrand, Max. The Records of the Federal Convention, in American Historical Review, vol. 13(1907), pp. 44–65.

460 Hamilton, Alexander. Notes in the Federal Convention of 1787. Edited by Worthington C. Ford. In American Historical Review, vol. 10(1904), pp. 97–109.

461 Holst, Hermann E. von. The Constitutional and Political History of the United States. Chicago, 1889, 8 vols.

462 Hulbert, Archer B. Washington and the West. Contains Washington's diary of September, 1784, kept during his journey into the Ohio Basin in the interest of a commercial union between the great lakes and the Potomac River. New York, 1905.

463 Jameson, J. Franklin. Studies in the History of the Federal Convention of 1787, in Annual Report of American Historical Association for 1902, vol. 1. Washington, 1903. Contains a bibliography of the letters written by the leaders of the convention.

464 McLaughlin, Andrew C. James Wilson and the Constitution, in Political Science Quarterly for March, 1897.

465 Madison, James. Notes in the Federal Convention. Madison's invaluable notes have been published several times. One of the best editions is in Gaillard Hunt's Writings of Madison (New York, 1908, 8 vols. +), vols. 3–4. A careful reproduction appears in the Documentary History of the Constitution (456), vol. 3. Also see Henry D. Gilpin's Madison Papers (Washington, 1840, 3 vols.; Philadelphia, 1841, 3 vols.), and Elliot's Debates (457), vol. 5.

466 Martin, Luther. Genuine Information. Philadelphia, 1788. Frequently reprinted, especially with Yates's Debates (473). A summary of the debates in the convention, delivered orally as Martin's report to the Maryland legislature.

467 Meigs, William M. Growth of the Constitution in the Federal Convention of 1787. Philadelphia, 1900.

468 Paterson, William. Papers of William Paterson on the Federal Convention, 1787, in American Historical Review, vol. 9(1904), pp. 310–340.

469 Pierce, William. Notes on the Federal Convention, in American Historical Review, vol. 3(1897), pp. 310–334.

470 Steiner, Bernard C. Life and Correspondence of Dr. James McHenry. Cleveland, 1908.

471 Stimson, Frederic J. The American Constitution. New York, 1908.

472 Tucker, John R. The Constitution of the United States. Chicago, 1899, 2 vols.

473 Yates, Robert. Secret Proceedings and Debates of the Convention, 1787. Albany, 1821. Republished in Elliot's Debates (457), vol. 5, pp. 109–565. A brief summary of the debates in the convention between May 25 and July 5, when Yates withdrew.

For the general index to this work see the last volume

SCHEELE MEMORIAL LIBRARY
3 6655 00104217 4

Avery

E
178 Avery
.A95 A history of the United
vol. 6 States and its people.

E
178 Avery
.A95 A history of the Uni-
vol. 6 ted States and its people.

DATE	ISSUED TO

Concordia College Library
Bronxville, New York 10708

PRINTED IN U.S.A.

United States

Avery ★

United States